MOUNTAIN SPORTS

THE SUMMIT

"Coming back down is the hard and deadly part in mountain climbing: Climbers are exhausted, and can become careless in the euphoria of their accomplishment. This document of the notorious quest to the top of K2 in 2008, considered more daunting than conquering Mt. Everest, is a heart-throbbing experience. In that quest, 11 of 24 expert climbers lost their lives. A packed, Sunday night house [at Sundance 2013] was spellbound, some viewers clutching their seats while experiencing this mesmeric film." — Duane Byrge, Hollywood Reporter

THE CRASH REEL

The meteoric rise, calamitous crash and remarkable endurance of US champion snowboarder Kevin Pearce are related with nerve-wracking immediacy in Lucy Walker's (Waste Land) documentary. Like any extreme sports addict – and Pearce hails from a family of them – he brings a load of spectacular footage to his cine-biographer, hours of videos shot on course and off since he was a kid. Walker uses the material expertly to show us how Pearce found his element on the slopes. We also see how a turbo-charged sports industry goads its adrenalin junkies constantly, to go harder, to take ever greater risks. Little encouragement may be required: the action footage conveys the exhilaration of danger the way Trainspotting once showed the thrill of Class A drugs. The cold turkey here is a whole lot tougher, and The Crash Reel provides an intensely moving portrait of Pearce's family pulling him through a recuperation he's not always convinced will pay off. "By turns pulse-quickening and contemplative, The Crash Reel is a thoroughly winning portrait." — Rob Nelson, Variety
