WELLINGTON
2020, what year! And it’s only July... But what a Festival we have for you.

Since we’ve all shared the arc of this extraordinary year so far, I’m sure it’s needless to say the unique 2020 New Zealand International Film Festival isn’t exactly the one I’d imagined when I took up my position as Director — Kaiwhakatere in October 2019.

In many ways it’s been like coming home to Aotearoa and being unexpectedly signed up for a whole bucket list of adrenalin sports; white-water rafting, bungy jumping, skydiving, black-water caving and even shark diving could be metaphors to describe any given day for myself and our team over the past six months as we’ve forged, hacked and white-knuckled our way through the uncharted territory COVID-19 has presented to us and the world.

But the challenges we’ve met and the risks we’ve taken have led to innovation and discovery. These discoveries you’ll find not only in the world-class selection of films you’d expect from your favourite film festival, but also in the way you experience them both online – at home, and in cinemas across the country.

You’ll find entirely new ways to mine the riches of our programme; Premieres, Widescreen and Spotlight strands suggest a baseline profile of all our films but these are further curated into 14 Collections, binding films together by a shared theme, tone or attitude. Digging deeper still, you’ll find each film is connected in many different ways all of them searchable on our website.

Of course, our favourite curators are back bringing you Square Eyes (formerly For All Ages) for children and youth, Incredibly Strange for genre film lovers and Animation NOW! for devotees of drawn, painted and graphic storytelling. All these can be found in the new Curated section of the programme.

Also for the first time, both our New Zealand’s Best and Ngā Whanaunga Māori Pasifika Shorts curations will be competitive, with new prizes soon to be announced for Ngā Whanaunga. Both competitions will be judged by international juries of esteemed figures from the world of film, arts and culture.

Lastly, I hope the newly launched Festival identity and branding is already unavoidable as you leaf through this catalogue and scour our website for your 2020 film selections.

We hope you love it as much as we do as it was devised to reflect our crucial relationship to you, our festival audience.

The new Festival identity is defined first by the descriptor Whānau Mārama – family of light, to suggest the community which unites every July and August, to share the light – mārama, to be found in the films, stories and ideas projected on screens across the country.

Enjoy the 2020 New Zealand International Film Festival whānau!

Film is light, mārama; captured in a camera then set free on the screen.

Collections

Collections are curated sections to help you navigate the programme’s key themes, guide your discovery of films and filmmakers, and enrich your festival journey through new and unexpected connections.

Aotearoa

We’re proud to provide a premiere platform for striking work made within our shores.

The documentaries we champion this year all engage powerfully – and positively – with deep personal and generational histories, while for the first time we present a web series, one which sets a new bar for queer and trans (self-) representation on screen.

We’re also thrilled to elevate short filmmaking in Aotearoa with our two annual programmes for emerging talent, New Zealand’s Best and Ngā Whanaunga, plus a third programme of Kiwi gems from around the country.

Indigenous Voices

As much about migration as homeland, the native filmmaking voices in this collection tell stories of both upheaval and return. Their remarkably diverse experiences reflect on opportunity, displacement, strife and spirituality.

We’ve also programmed Peter Weir’s The Last Wave, one of the earliest films to interact thoughtfully with Indigenous Australia.

Aotearoa films are proudly supported by Resene.
Films that explore growing pains, regardless of experience or generation. You’ll find rites-of-passage tales here both arresting and achingly familiar in their depiction of youth and young adulthood, and crucially, coming-of-age portraits of people late in life, about to begin a new life, against the grain of social norms.

Between documenting reality and dramatising history, these cogent narratives grapple with degrees of political ambition in countries with long, chequered pasts.

In each situation, be it democracy in action or a dictatorship rising from the ashes, the parallels to our current world political climate are devastatingly clear.

Mobilise

Four documentaries of defiance and protest that take us to the frontlines of activism today and face-to-face with the people fighting – and dancing – for their cause.

The two fiction films here galvanise with their own brand of headstrong storytelling about fighting the establishment, a classic cinematic narrative if ever there was one.

Radical Empathy

These extraordinary films all have in common a rare commitment to portraying troubled individuals through fearlessly compassionate means. They not only open the door to places where empathy exists in spite of stigma or taboo, but ask us to see the world from the eyes of the marginalised and the shamed, reframing their behaviours and our own understanding of where they come from.

Political States

Between documenting reality and dramatising history, these cogent narratives grapple with degrees of political ambition in countries with long, chequered pasts.

In each situation, be it democracy in action or a dictatorship rising from the ashes, the parallels to our current world political climate are devastatingly clear.
Revolting against tradition and cultural norms, the agitators of this section challenge their families, their social structure and the conventional wisdom of their peers, ultimately striving to define themselves in opposition – or in the spirit of non-binary action, not at all.

Celebrating pride, whatever your stripes. Not every character here is out and proud in ideal circumstances, but the importance of reckoning with the disempowerment of LGBTQI+ communities everywhere, while also rejoicing in self-expression and diversity, is not lost on the artists of these films, either. Several of their works also contend with the fluid intersection of cultural and sexual identity, and the fascinating push-pull between those two hemispheres (see also: Black Milk).

Gala Premieres

Our opening and closing night events, hosted online for the very first time.

Bookending the Festival are two emphatic features about iron-willed crusaders: Ned Kelly in Justin Kurzel’s punk, postmodern True History of the Kelly Gang; and Nordic farm-warrior Inga in Grimur Hákonarson’s rousing The County.

Films in this strand are available to watch as Online Premieres and Online Rentals.
Opening Night

From Sir Sydney Nolan’s epic paintings to Peter Carey’s Booker Prize-winning novel, Ned Kelly has come a long way to find himself thundering on horseback across a barren moonlit landscape, dressed only in boots and a flowing lace frock, in this dazzling postmodern version of the outlaw legend.

Adapting Carey’s 2001 novel of the same name, director Justin Kurzel’s Ned Kelly (1917’s George McKay as an adult) lives out his short but audacious life writ-large in punk graffiti scrawled across a canvas far bigger and more surreal than any other film or cultural depiction to date.

Ned spends the film failing to win the love of his mother Ellen (Essie Davis, more complex and luminous than ever), who at one point sells the child to her sometime-lover and bushranger Harry Power (Russell Crowe) – a gesture one wonders might be as much to deflect Ned’s burgeoning Oedipal gaze as it is to earn a pretty coin. Ned finds some consolation in the arms of young sex worker Rose (Thomasin Harcourt McKenzie), a cynical soulmate of sorts, while we’re encouraged to deduce he also shares something deeper than just fraternal bro-hood with his loyal friend and Kelly Gang member Joe Byrne (Sean Keenan). No putting this gang into any binary corner.

Kelly’s justified rage against the colonial constabulary, endowed with some disconcerting allure in Charlie Hunnam’s predatory Sg’t O’Neil and the louche decadence of Nicolas Hoult’s Constable Fitzpatrick, fuels his rapid ascent to anti-heroic superstardom. — Marten Rabarts

About the Filmmaker

Justin Kurzel is an Australian director based in London. His debut film was the acclaimed, controversial Snowtown (NZIFF11). He has also directed adaptations of Macbeth (2015) and the popular video game series Assassin’s Creed (2016), both starring Michael Fassbender.
The County

Closing Night

We close the Festival with this quintessentially Icelandic comedy about one woman’s fight against a monopolistic co-op stifling the livelihoods of farmers in a remote valley near Reykjavik. Adroitly blending humour and injustice together with the lightest of touches, it’s a worthy successor to NZIFF18 audience favourite Woman at War.

It is predictably Nordic that a film portraying the struggle for justice against a mafia-like co-operative in a windblown Icelandic hamlet, where the elements have etched the passage of time into the handsome but weathered faces of both Inga and her husband Reynir much as the rugged terrain they call a farm, would be described as a comedy.

What’s more, the story kicks off with the unexpected death of Reynir as his truck rolls into a ravine – the catalyst for Inga’s grizzled yet fiercely entertaining crusade for the future of her fellow farmers in a remote valley in Iceland. Arndís Hrönn Egilsdóttir is tremendous as the grieving widow who suspects more was at play to her husband’s passing than the natural hardships of agricultural life. Uncovering a trail of bullying and anti-competitive behaviour by the farming co-op and its disarmingly corrupt CEO, she sets out to level the playing field – mansplaining and mudslinging be damned.

Somehow Grímur Hákonarson – director of the wryly observed Rams (NZIFF15) – manages with his deft touch and a heart as big as a tractor to find a tone that smoothly melds trademark Icelandic gruffness with a good dose of Erin Brockovich in gumboots. — Marten Rabarts

The Girl on the Bridge

World Premiere

In the increasing public discourse on mental health, Leanne Pooley’s inspiring and fearless documentary tracks an extraordinary young woman’s journey from suicide survivor to advocate for those struggling. The fact it leaves you hopeful and with tangible advice makes it vital viewing.

Almost a film-within-a-film, The Girl on the Bridge explores the emotional tightrope to be walked when tackling a taboo and emotional topic. It follows 21-year-old Jazz Thornton during the pivotal two-year period she was emerging out of her own struggles with suicide to become a powerful advocate for mental health. During this time, she was also embarking on a personal project, the award-winning 2019 web series Jessica’s Tree, which pays reflective tribute to the eponymous friend whose life she could not save.

New Zealanders are aware of our suicide statistics and with a similar kaupapa to Maui’s Hook (NZIFF18), director Pooley and Thornton demand that the silence be lifted. Jazz, who has lived experience of eight years of depression, understands first-hand the power people find in realising they are not alone.

Thanks to Jazz’s extraordinary vision, and her authentic and engaging manner, her story provides epiphanies for every viewer concerned about Aotearoa’s suicide statistics and the fate of our rangatahi. Tangibly carrying the weight of responsibility intrinsic in such sensitive subject matter, Pooley’s film opens a window, through Jazz, for us all to lean in to the challenge to be part of making the world better.

About the Filmmaker

Leanne Pooley has worked as a documentary filmmaker for 25 years. She was made a New Zealand Arts Laureate in 2011. Selected filmography: We Need to Talk about A.I. (2020), 25 April (2015), Beyond the Edge (2013), The Topp Twins: Untouchable Girls (2009).
LOIMATA, The Sweetest Tears

World Premiere

Director Anna Marbrook honours the last voyage of the great waka maker, sailor and mentor Ema Siope, whose journeys between Aotearoa and Sāmoa in search of healing, and her family’s reckoning with systemic abuse, are powerfully documented.

The redemptive tale of waka builder and captain Lilo Ema Siope’s final years, the stunning LOIMATA, The Sweetest Tears is a chronicle of journeys – journeys of migration, spirituality, voyaging, healing and coming home. Confronting intergenerational trauma head on, the Siope family returns to their homeland of Sāmoa. For Ema’s father, this is his first time back to his birthplace since leaving in 1959. The result is a poignant yet tender story of a family’s unconditional love for each other, and a commitment to becoming whole again.

Ema was born and raised in South Auckland as a child of Samoan migrants. She captained both the Haunui Waka Hourua and Aotearoa One, both of which belong to the great waka master Hoturoa Barclay-Kerr. Ema’s key role in the revival of voyaging saw her become an important mentor for future generations of voyagers.

Directed by Ema’s friend Anna Marbrook, the project developed alongside the pair’s friendship while spending time together on the waka. LOIMATA, The Sweetest Tears builds on Marbrook’s previous documentary works which highlight both the resurgence of voyaging and the silencing of its history by colonisation, while extending a raw and stirring tribute to an extraordinary truth seeker. — Lana Lopesi

About the Filmmaker

Anna Marbrook comes from a theatre and live performance background. Her screen work, which focuses on Pacific themes, includes Waka Warriors, Real Pasifik and the documentary Te Mana o te Moana: The Pacific Voyagers.

Premieres
Premiering their forthcoming web series as a special festival presentation, director Max Currie (Everything We Loved, NZIFF14) and writer Cole Meyers’ queer and trans-celebratory drama swells with character and heart.

A young trans activist, Caz (Elz Carrad), breaks down in tears in front of a support group towards the start of Rūrangi. He doesn’t know how he can help the queer people in front of him, and feels entirely guilty, even shameful about that fact. Like many of our young queer people, he’s burned out not by his struggle, but by the struggle of those around him. Having fled his hometown of Rūrangi to find himself, Caz returns hoping to connect not just with his father (Kirk Torrance), who he left ten years ago, pre-transition, but the small community whose residents are having struggles of their own now as well.

Rūrangi is unapologetically frank and unapologetically queer, with not just a strong ensemble – Ramon Te Wake, Arlo Green and Kirk Torrance being special standouts – but a diverse, inclusive cast. But the calling card for the web series, packaged here into a slick five-episode binge watch, is the searing screen debut of Elz Carrad. Carrad carries the entire series on his shoulders; he externalises, with detail and charisma, the struggles of a person stuck between wanting, nay, needing, to talk about and express his own demons, but always caught dealing with the needs of others. — Sam Brooks

"I’d never share a rope with him" is about as damning a comment as anyone can make about a fellow mountaineer. Sir Edmund Hillary’s words about Earle Riddiford in his last autobiography set the uneasy tone of this nuanced documentary by Earle’s son Richard Riddiford.

In 1951, climber Earle Riddiford organised New Zealand’s first Himalayan expedition, inviting an Auckland beekeeper by the name of Ed Hillary along. The successful ascent of Mukut Parbat (7,242 metres) opened the pathway to Everest for Hillary, a debt our national hero never fully acknowledged.

Upset and confused by Hillary’s comment, Earle’s daughter Anna Riddiford was driven to find answers, and to better understand her difficult father, on a journey spanning 15 years. Brother Richard’s reluctance to engage forms part of the film, as they confront the highest stakes in mountaineering history. "What do you do when the man on the $5 note disparages your father?"

Using interviews with Riddiford’s climbing companions, archival audio and photographs, modern footage of the Southern Alps and a trek through the Indian Himalayas, Before Everest explores the determination of a man who catapulted New Zealanders to Everest. Anecdotes from Hillary writer Tom Scott also lend further clues to the nature of Sir Ed’s relationship with Riddiford and his peers.

Beyond its appreciation of mountains and climbing, the film’s discovery of truths makes for a compelling and ultimately uplifting journey through one family’s history. — Shaun Barnett

Driveways

The definition of a small but perfectly formed gem, the gracefully understated Driveways centres on a young Asian boy who develops a precious friendship with the lonely war vet living next door, played memorably by the late Brian Dennehy.

Korean-American director Andrew Ahn’s sophomore film follows single mother Kathy (Hong Chau) and her eight-year-old son Cody (Lucas Jaye) to an unfamiliar New York town to settle the estate of her deceased sister. Upon entering the house, Kathy discovers her sister’s hoarding compulsion and has to face the posthumous secrets between the estranged pair in an effort to find closure. Meanwhile, Cody sparks an unlikely connection with the next-door neighbour, widower and Korean War veteran Del (a quiet yet soulful Brian Dennehy, in one of his final film roles). Ahn’s careful direction draws three tender and nuanced performances from three guarded characters, crafting a credible portrait of real lives while their past lingers in the present.

Kathy and Cody’s Asian American identity bypasses the obvious conflicts of race in a refreshing turn, a choice in casting suggested by Ahn. Instead, the film chooses to focus on life’s familiar quotidian struggles and incremental victories to normalise the Asian American experience. As a result, Driveways captures the verisimilitude of ordinary life with its unobtrusive plot and eye for detail, creating a gentle meditation on connection through grief and change. — Nahyeon Lee

About the Filmmaker
Andrew Ahn is a Korean-American filmmaker born and raised in Los Angeles. His first feature, Spa Night (2016), premiered at Sundance in the US Dramatic Competition. The film’s lead, Joe Seo, won a Special Jury Award for Breakthrough Performance. It went on to win the 2017 John Cassavetes Independent Spirit Award.
Something completely different from the director of Beasts of the Southern Wild (NZIFF12), this swirling, kaleidoscopic take on the adventures of Peter Pan and Wendy in Neverland is uniquely for both mature kids and wide-eyed adults.

The eight long years since Benh Zeitlin’s magical first film landed countless awards and four Oscar nominations have created both buzz and speculation, owing to the mythic status a project by a director of Zeitlin’s instant acclaim deserves. His adaptation of the classic J.M. Barrie tale, at last complete, is every bit the original, defiantly alternative reimagining we expected – and just maybe, is destined for cult status.

Centred on a hardscrabble Louisiana family, the film introduces young Wendy (Devin France), whose obsession with a mysterious boy seen leaping between railcars compels her to jump aboard a train with her twin brothers, where they meet the one and only Peter Pan (Yashua Mack). Whisked off to a strange volcanic island, the kids revel in an untamed landscape that promises they’ll never grow old. Hurdling between images of Disney-like wonder, scenes of salty mischief-making (reminiscent of The Florida Project) and darker encounters that may frighten younger viewers, it’s a film that plays to its own beat, rebelling against the conventional wisdom of what a Peter Pan story should look and feel like, and say about innocence and growing up, to be precisely the thing it wants to be.

About the Filmmaker
Benh Zeitlin is a writer, director and composer based in New Orleans. His feature debut, Beasts of the Southern Wild (2012), received the Camera d’Or at Cannes and Academy Award-nominations for writing, direction, best film and best actress. He has composed music for his own films and others, including Brimstone & Glory (NZIFF18).
A peek behind the curtain of the self-proclaimed “Disneyland for Retirees”, first-time director Lance Oppenheim’s humorous and bittersweet documentary follows four recent arrivals as they search for the American Dream.

Welcome to The Villages in central Florida, the largest retirement community in the world. Pitched as a literal fountain of youth complete with precision golf cart drills, pickleball rallies and singles mixers. It’s a chance for retirees to live the American Dream in their golden years, but debut director Lance Oppenheim’s quirky and insightful documentary picks beneath the surface to find that one person’s paradise can be another’s burden.

Married nearly 50 years, Anne and Reggie seem like a normal couple, but The Villages’ cookie-cutter lifestyle awakens Reggie’s rebelliousness, leading him to explore Eastern spiritualism and experiment in drug use. Meanwhile 81-year-old ladies’ man Dennis lives out of his van and must evade security as he searches for a “classic looking” widow to take him in. Barbara is looking for a more meaningful relationship after having recently lost the love of her life, but is a dashing golf cart salesman really the answer?

Taking inspiration from the photography of Larry Sultan and the Technicolor sheen of Douglas Sirk’s melodramas, Oppenheim opts for a vibrant visual style that accentuates the absurdity of this manufactured utopia. — Michael McDonnell

In the Name of the Land

A revelation at the French box office that’s also bound to resonate with heartland New Zealanders, In the Name of the Land humanely and bittersweetly celebrates the life of a stoic farmer over four decades of struggle.

In this heart-aching family saga set in the Mayenne district of France, the elemental and emotional challenges of farming are depicted with poignant, personal force. French star Guillaume Canet, in a deeply affecting performance, plays Pierre, who takes over his father’s farm as a young man in the late 70s. Marrying his sweetheart (Veerle Batens) and raising a son and daughter on the land gives rise to many joyous moments, but also never-ending adversity against the changing landscape of modern, corporate-driven agriculture. Finance and misfortune eventually take their toll, as Pierre goes to a dark place that echoes the vulnerability of farming communities everywhere and the pressures they face to survive, much less prosper.

Based on his own childhood and dedicated to his parents, Édouard Bergeon’s debut feature comes from a genuine place of admiration for the resilience of men and women like his father. It also sensitively broaches the subject of mental health and the boundaries of masculinity explored as indelibly in our own national cinema with its archetypal portrayal of tough rural life – most memorably at this festival in The Ground We Won (NZIFF15) and last year’s Bellbird.

About the Filmmaker
Édouard Bergeon is a journalist with a background in writing and directing documentaries for television. Inspired by the life of his father Christian Bergeon, who became a farmer in 1979, In the Name of the Land is his first narrative film.

After conquering Cannes with Shoplifters, Japanese auteur Kore-eda Hirokazu breathlessly transposes his beloved cinema of families, food and slow-burning truths to Paris, with an all-star cast led by two doyennes of the French silver screen.

Japan’s modern master of the family drama slides gracefully into the annals of French film history with The Truth, his fourteenth narrative feature and the first made outside of his homeland, boasting no less than the inaugural pairing of icons Catherine Deneuve and Juliette Binoche.

Playing an equally luminous, if far more imperious version of herself, Deneuve is superb as the prickly Fabienne, a legendary actress about to publish her memoirs. Arriving in Paris for the book launch is screenwriter daughter Lumir (Binoche), her second-rate TV actor husband Hank (Ethan Hawke) and their little girl Charlotte (Clémentine Grenier, proving yet again Kore-eda’s eye for child actors is impeccable). All appear not as close to Fabienne as her writings suggest.

Meanwhile, Kore-eda’s interests in memory and familial resentment shimmer in the reflective surfaces of the sci-fi movie Fabienne is shooting, about a mother-daughter relationship age-inverted by the time dilation effects of space. It’s a pleasure to witness this dynamic further mirrored in the exchanges between Deneuve and Binoche, here revelling in the subtle and not-so-subtle friction of their mingling screen personas.

About the Filmmaker
Martin Eden

In the earthy, captivatingly idiosyncratic Martin Eden, a lowly sailor romances a sophisticated young woman while plunging into an epic love affair with literature and intellectual curiosity in 20th-century Italy.

Jack London’s sweeping semi-autobiographical novel gets an unexpectedly poetic Neapolitan translation in this ambitious new feature from Italian director Pietro Marcello. Long known for making cryptic, beautiful miniature length films (Lost and Beautiful, NZIFF16) that combine dramatic and documentary elements with archive footage, Marcello here attaches his exquisite eye, attention to lived-in detail and mountains of archive footage to a compelling narrative of artistic aspiration, class struggle and desperate romance.

Grounded in Luca Marinelli’s towering and award-winning performance as the hardscrabble undereducated sailor with literary dreams and dogged determination whose talent and arrogance grow in equal proportions, Martin Eden deftly moves from decaying celluloid and stunning monochrome glimpses of history to freshly-exposed 16mm film, and from heaving sea and grimy alleys to sprawling estates, sumptuous countryside and decadent apartments. Equally besotted with language and images, Martin Eden embraces the contradictions of the spirited artist who sows the seeds of his own self-destruction, and delivers its emotional payloads with unflinching honesty and uncommon brio. — Doug Dillaman

Martin Margiela: In His Own Words

A belated and buoyant documentary portrait of Martin Margiela, celebrated for his trailblazing designs and humble, enigmatic persona within the flamboyant fashion world.

One of the most influential and intriguing figures in recent fashion history, Belgian designer Martin Margiela is the pivotal yet unseen subject of this captivating and sensitive documentary from Reiner Holzemer (Dries, NZIFF17).

A protégé of Jean-Paul Gaultier, Margiela’s anonymity is mythical and an enduring point of industry fascination; during his two decades helming Maison Martin Margiela, he was never photographed, seen or interviewed by the press – any communication was conducted via fax. The mystery deepened when he walked away from the industry without warning in 2009. It is here that the film begins, with his final show, before tracing his childhood, education and career with gentle revelation.

Finally voicing his story, Margiela discusses his groundbreaking work and enduring legacy. Much of what the 63-year-old pioneered – street casting, reissues and upcycling – is now commonplace. By allowing him to remain faceless Holzemer reinforces the power of Margiela’s reticence; we don’t need to see his face to understand his work and appreciate its impact, and now in the midst of a dramatically shifting industry, Margiela’s enduring critique of pace and publicity feels more relevant than ever. — Emma Gleason

About the Filmmaker
Once Were Brothers: Robbie Robertson and The Band

The saga of The Band, whose iconic farewell concert was immortalised in The Last Waltz, continues to captivate in this new documentary shaped from the perspective of guitarist–songwriter Robbie Robertson, only one of two surviving members.

In a sense Robbie Robertson only has one story, but it's a great one: how four Canadian rockers and an Arkansas drummer set out together in the early 1960s and wound up in the eye of that decade's cultural hurricane. The story of The Band was the basis of Martin Scorsese's The Last Waltz, and has been revisited by countless rock chroniclers since.

But the years since The Last Waltz have given it a sad coda, with several of Robertson's bandmates falling to addictions and early deaths, and a bitter disagreement between Robbie and his southern confederate Levon Helm, who accused him of using The Band to further his own ambitions.

It’s hard not to see Once Were Brothers as Robertson’s response to Ain’t In It For My Health (NZIFF11), the unvarnished 2010 documentary that told the tale from Helm’s point of view. Robertson’s version is more magnanimous, yet one can't help feeling he is, once again, furthering an agenda. And yet the whole thing is brought to life with a wealth of rare and unseen images, plus revealing interviews including the uproarious Ronnie Hawkins and the rarely seen Dominique Robertson, Robbie’s wife. There is also plenty of The Band’s music which, of course, sounds as great as ever. — Nick Bollinger

The Kingmaker

Lauren Greenfield (The Queen of Versailles, NZIFF12) harnesses extraordinary access and the boastful, unrepentant nature of her subject, Imelda Marcos, in this unsettling chronicle of ill-gotten wealth and political corruption.

We’ve all heard about the 1,220 pairs of shoes Imelda Marcos abandoned when she fled Manila in 1986, a symbol of the wealth she and her dictator husband, Ferdinand Marcos, embezzled while running the country’s economy and human rights into the ground. Now in her 80s, the former first lady of the Philippines is still as extravagant – and impenitent – as ever. Captured like never before, this eye-opening documentary paints a damning picture of Marcos’ ego in private, and her vanity in public as she flexes her political ambitions once more through son Bongbong, a vice presidential candidate, and other insidious networks of corruption.

As astute as it is ominous, The Kingmaker examines a staggering sense of denial and self-importance that resonates today for obvious reasons, but even more potently, a history of violence that threatens to resurface. Interviews with Marcos’ allies and enemies, and reflections on the suffering of communities during martial law, reveal the horrors behind the legacy. So confident of her importance to the Philippines, Marcos believes she’s starring in a hagiography, but what director Lauren Greenfield gets on camera is much closer to The Act of Killing. — Tim Wong

About the Filmmaker
While at War

The acclaimed director of The Sea Inside returns with his most handsomely mounted film yet, an expansive yet deep-focus drama detailing events around the Spanish Civil War and the rise of Franco’s fascist dictatorship.

In Alejandro Amenábar latest film, celebrated Spanish writer Miguel de Unamuno becomes a lens through which a critical moment in the country’s history is refracted back to our unstable political present. Building meticulously to Unamuno’s famous speech of protest, While at War chronicles the consequences of complacency – and how easily tyrants can ascend to power – with chilling majesty.

“It is 1936 and the Spanish Civil War is in its infancy. We quickly learn that Unamuno – the dean of Salamanca University – has vacillated between sides in terms of his writings, although he would say it is other people, rather than his philosophy that has shifted. Now elderly – and played thoughtfully and soulfully by Karra Elejalde – Unamuno enjoys a small intellectual bubble with friends, a priest Atilano (Luis Zahera) and Salvador (Carlos Serrano-Clark), a young and feisty Marxist, but is dismissive of their fears of fascism. Meanwhile, in Morocco, in scenes threaded through with inky humour that recalls The Death of Stalin, we see Franco [Santi Prego] carefully and almost imperceptibly manoeuvring his way to the top.” — Amber Wilkinson, Eye for Film

About the Filmmaker

Alejandro Amenábar was born in Santiago, Chile. He first came to prominence with the cult thriller Thesis (1996) and is best known for directing the Academy Award-winning The Sea Inside (Best Foreign Language Film, 2004). Selected filmography: Agora (2009), The Others (2001), Open Your Eyes (1997).
Travellers and migrants who vanish without a trace – and the desperation of the families they leave behind – come to light in this tense, enveloping drama set in the shadow of the US–Mexico border.

An absorbing debut feature, Identifying Features follows Magdalena (Mercedes Hernández), an illiterate Mexican woman, as she leaves her rural home in search of her teenage son, missing since departing for the US border with a friend two months prior.

Director Fernanda Valadez and her largely female crew deftly and inventively frame this story of dogged maternal love in a violence-plagued world. With Hernández’s stunning performance at its heart, the film – much of it shot with a team of only three – balances the horrors facing migrants before they even reach the border with the power of human resilience. The story follows other mothers, other sons: all eventually intersect with Magdalena. Claudia Becerril Bulos’ lyrical camera often rests on Magdalena’s face: that of her interlocutor is withheld until long into the scene (if shown at all). Glimpses of a migrant shelter, armed checkpoints and the imposing border itself build a sense of scale without losing intimacy. A hallucinatory score from Clarice Jensen is used sparingly, to immersive effect.

Dread builds as Magdalena’s odyssey takes her into an increasingly remote and empty landscape: the climax hits with extraordinary force. — Catherine Bisley

Ema

Pure, unadulterated cinema, the latest from Chilean maestro Pablo Larraín is straight fire: a scorching character study of one woman’s pursuit of sexual and political liberation, lit up by Mariana Di Girolamo’s sensational lead performance.

Few films in recent memory have blazed a trail as passionately as Pablo Larraín’s Ema, which signals the director’s return to the present and his native Chile via the incandescent city of Valparaíso.

Mariana Di Girolamo, in a star turn you won’t be able to take your eyes off, plays the titular dancer, mother and pyro-lover impervious to social norms. On a quest to reclaim her adopted son Polo, whose absence explains her deteriorating marriage to choreographer Gastón (Gael García Bernal), Ema sets out on a path of deliberate resistance, embracing the orgasmic street movement of reggaeton and embarking on a fluid succession of relationships with people of all genders in her orbit. For reasons that don’t need explaining, she also owns a flamethrower and rejoices in burning shit down – a none-too-subtle metaphor for her relentless pursuit of catharsis and the film’s white-hot energy through which creative and sexual expression bursts forth.

Every bit the firecracker that had critics in Venice, where it premiered, clamouring for superlatives, Larraín’s film is visually stunning, fuelled with combustible symbolism and physicality, and a genuine war cry for dancers, lovers and the matriarchy everywhere. — Tim Wong

About the Filmmaker
Pablo Larraín was born in Santiago, Chile. His international breakthrough, Tony Manero (2008), was followed by Post Mortem (2010), No (NZIFF12), The Club (NZIFF15) and Neruda (NZIFF16). In 2016 he directed his first English-language film, the Oscar-nominated Jackie.
The Perfect Candidate

Saudi superstar director Haifaa Al-Mansour’s latest is a winning homecoming; a serio-comic look at the daily struggles of a doctor running for council – and her fellow women and outsiders – within an Islamic society undergoing dramatic change.

In Haifaa Al-Mansour’s Arabic follow-up to her NZIFF13 crowd-pleaser Wadjda, we first meet Maryam (Mila Al Zahrani) wearing a niqaab and driving to work at the local hospital, something that has only been possible since 2018. As the female doctor she faces discrimination not only from a male patient but also a colleague reprimanding her for not kowtowing to the patient’s demands.

Her attempt to attend a Dubai medical conference is thwarted by bureaucracy. A race against the clock to get her visa cleared drolly concludes with her signing up to run for the municipal elections. Her new agenda: to get the road paved outside her hospital so that patients can access necessary healthcare.

With the sibling support of entrepreneurial wedding photographer Selma and begrudging assistance from teenage Sara, Maryam sets out to win hearts and minds. All the while Dad is away touring the country as an accomplished singer and oud player – itself a controversial occupation in a country where public music performances must have prior approval. What plays out is a subtle and engaging portrait of life’s little challenges for those on the outside finally being let in, bit by bit, to a society that is rapidly evolving. — Rebecca McMillan

About the Filmmaker
In 2012, Haifaa al-Mansour became the first Saudi woman to ever direct a feature film. Her debut, Wadjda (2012), was the first feature to be filmed entirely in Saudi Arabia. She has also directed two English-language films, the biopic Mary Shelley (2017) and Nappily Ever After (2018) for Netflix.
Steelers: The World’s First Gay Rugby Club

World Premiere

The Steelers journey to compete in the World Cup of gay rugby in this hopeful yet emotionally honest sports documentary about playing for pride, whoever your team is.

In 1995 a bunch of gay men formed the first gay rugby club while sitting in a pub in London, the spirit of comradery (and beer) already apparent. More than 60 clubs have formed around the world since, coming together to play for the Bingham Cup every two years.

The road to the World Cup, the journey to the championship – it’s a tried-and-true sports narrative and one that Steelers revels in as we head to Amsterdam for the 2018 tournament. For sports fans, rugby is certainly a constant in this uplifting debut feature from Eammon Ashton-Atkinson, but it’s the players and their stories that really shine through.

The Cup forms the backdrop as we meet one of the newer players on the team, battling depression on and off the field; a key forward who dabbles in drag; and the female coach who still has to battle sexism while participating in a competition that fosters equality and inclusivity. It’s a lo-fi portrait with a wonderfully big heart to it.

Ultimately, the rugby club has become a place to belong, where you can be whatever you want. As the players find their self-confidence on the pitch, you can’t help but root for them and celebrate gay sporting lives. You might appreciate the many shots of topless men in speedos, too. — Steph Walker

In 1995 a bunch of gay men formed the first gay rugby club while sitting in a pub in London, the spirit of comradery (and beer) already apparent. More than 60 clubs have formed around the world since, coming together to play for the Bingham Cup every two years.

The road to the World Cup, the journey to the championship – it’s a tried-and-true sports narrative and one that Steelers revels in as we head to Amsterdam for the 2018 tournament. For sports fans, rugby is certainly a constant in this uplifting debut feature from Eammon Ashton-Atkinson, but it’s the players and their stories that really shine through.

The Cup forms the backdrop as we meet one of the newer players on the team, battling depression on and off the field; a key forward who dabbles in drag; and the female coach who still has to battle sexism while participating in a competition that fosters equality and inclusivity. It’s a lo-fi portrait with a wonderfully big heart to it.

Ultimately, the rugby club has become a place to belong, where you can be whatever you want. As the players find their self-confidence on the pitch, you can’t help but root for them and celebrate gay sporting lives. You might appreciate the many shots of topless men in speedos, too. — Steph Walker

Ellie & Abbie (& Ellie’s Dead Aunt)

In this bright, affirmative lesbian teen rom-com, a girl awkwardly angles for the attention of her high school crush with a little help from the ghost of her aunt, a queer activist with a poignant history in the fight for LGBTQI+ rights.

It’s hard enough being a high school student, but Ellie (Sophie Hawkshaw) also has to stress about how to ask her crush Abbie (Zoe Terakes) to the formal without the certainty Abbie is into girls. If that’s not complicated enough, how about blurt out your plan and inadvertently coming out to your high-strung mum (Marta Dusseldorp), who did not seem to take the news very well? On top of that, Ellie gets a surprise visit from her dead aunt Tara (Julia Billington), in the form of a fairy godmother ghost, to help her coming out process! Along the way, Ellie discovers some family secrets that she might not be ready for.

Ellie & Abbie may have all the hallmarks of a classic high school rom-com, but first-time director Monica Zanetti also manages to subvert the genre and bring some genuine surprises to the table, including salient reminders of historical LGBTQI+ struggles that came before. The charming young leads are supported by a great cast, including New Zealand’s own Rachel House, who gives a deeply moving performance as Ellie’s surrogate aunt. Winner of the Audience Award at the Mardi Gras Film Festival, Ellie & Abbie combines romance, comedy and a nod to pride history in an impressive debut. — Vicci Ho

About the Filmmaker
Monica Zanetti is an award-winning Australian screenwriter and director. Skin Deep (2015), for which she wrote the screenplay, was honoured at Austin Film Festival with an award for Best Narrative Feature. Ellie & Abbie (& Ellie’s Dead Aunt) is her debut feature as a director.
Young Hunter

A smart and nuanced portrait of gay love matched with suspenseful and unexpected turns, Marco Berger’s latest film continues his acclaimed run of dramas exploring queer male desire and romance.

With his family on an extended holiday in Europe, 15-year-old Ezequiel (Juan Pablo Cestaro) has a pool in the backyard, a fridge of cold beer, a stack of porn and a raging teenage libido. He’s smart, cool and attractive, but neither his artfully casual seduction scenarios nor his carefully calibrated sleepovers with local boys from his wealthy Buenos Aires suburb deliver anything approaching reciprocity. A despondent trip to the skate park reverses Ezequiel’s fortunes however, where he’s quickly and effectively seduced by slightly older Mono (Lautaro Rodríguez), a skater boy whose origin from the other side of the tracks only adds to his allure.

Ezequiel’s newfound summer idyll is derailed with the unexpected return of his parents and younger sister. Mono’s older cousin has a weekend house in the country, and it’s there where this innocent teenage love story takes a much darker turn. Ezequiel is first hunted, and then must become the hunter himself, to escape an underworld where innocence and youth are the most highly prized commodities.

With his sixth feature, Marco Berger reaffirms his place among the leading talents of the New Argentine Cinema alongside Mateo Bendesky (Family Members) and Jazmín López (If I Were the Winter Itself) at this Festival. — Marten Rabarts

Corpus Christi

An ex-con masquerading as a priest works to heal the wounds of a grieving congregation with his unorthodox brand of faith and forgiveness in this darkly compelling Oscar-nominated Polish drama.

In Jan Komasa’s enthralling redemption tale, troublemaker Daniel (a magnetic Bartosz Bielenia), released from juvenile detention, desires to break free from a chequered past. After wandering into a village church, he’s mistaken for a new priest and seizes the divine opportunity to alter his life’s trajectory.

This close-knit village, fractured by recent tragedy, provides just the freshly turned soil Daniel needs to flourish. After shaky beginnings in the confessional booth, the young man discovers a natural empathy that elicits vulnerability and openness in his parishioners as he honestly seeks to aid a community in distress. Vicarious redemption and forgiveness seem within his grasp, but can Daniel’s transformation hold fast as harsh reality encroaches?

Riding high on the deservedly lauded lead performance of actor Bielenia, Corpus Christi weaves its existential concerns into a gripping drama, shot evocatively in muted colours and with a visual potency befitting Poland’s reputation for cinematography. Likewise, Bielenia’s Daniel exudes an unpredictable intensity throughout the entire film; an electric presence that energises even its darkest emotional turns. — Jacob Powell

About the Filmmaker
Instinct

Halina Reijn’s astonishingly assured directorial debut tensely interrogates the fantasises of a veteran therapist (Carice van Houten, Game of Thrones), whose attraction to a sex offender patient escalates into a dangerous cat-and-mouse game.

A bold and brilliant study of the borderlines between desire and domination, Instinct poses startling questions throughout every turn of its psychological duel between Idris (Marwan Kenzari), a prisoner undergoing treatment for violent sexual crime, and his therapist Nicoline, who may be developing feelings for him against her own best interest.

At a secure rehab facility, Nicoline is assigned the case of Idris, a volatile yet calculating serial rapist whose five years of institutionalisation have brought him close to freedom. While at first opposing his approval for unsupervised leave and alarmed at the audacity of his behaviour, Nicoline is gripped inexplicably by Idris’ dangerous charisma and her own fears and instincts, which play out in scenes of intense close-quarter confrontation.

Deserving of a content warning for survivors, director Halina Reijn’s film bravely seeks to understand the complexity and ambiguity of human nature without undermining the experience of the victim. It’s a fascinating tightrope walked as both a clinical thriller (shot potently by Monos cinematographer Jasper Wolf) and a multifaceted response to similar stories that suppress or simplify the woman’s perspective, with stunning performances that are equally vital to its purpose.

About the Filmmaker
Halina Reijn is a Dutch actress, director, writer and producer. Alongside Carice van Houten she is the co-founder of Man Up, a production company formed with the goal of exploring darker, edgier stories that often remain untold from a female perspective. Instinct is her first film as director and Man Up’s first production.
Relic

A female-centric, intergenerational haunted house story of the highest order, Relic takes the terrifying conceit of senile dementia and transforms it into a supernatural entity that engulfs sufferers and those who care for them.

Like the much-heralded The Babadook (NZIFF14), Relic was a Sundance standout that announced a major talent from down under: Japanese-Australian director Natalie Erika James, whose spooky new feature landed with the backing of Hollywood heavyweights Jake Gyllenhaal and the Russo Bros (Avengers).

Refreshingly observant and tender for a horror film, Relic is made all the more arresting through the intimate performances of its three leads. When her disconcertingly odd mother Edna (Robyn Nevin) is reported missing, Kay (Emily Mortimer) travels with her daughter Sam (Bella Heathcote) to her mother’s isolated house in the countryside. When Edna reappears with injuries, she refuses to talk, setting the stage for a slow descent into psychological horror, with the house itself intensifying the claustrophobia and atmospherics at hand.

Like its cinematic forebearers Legend of Hell House and The Haunting, a long-simmering arcane history of a home begins to leak out and smother the occupants. This simmering fusion of J-Horror spookiness and the real life terror of caring for parents nearing their final departure makes James’ debut that rare beast in genre film – a stylistic triumph that is equally scary and compassionate. — Ant Timpson

About the Filmmaker
Natalie Erika James is a Japanese-Australian writer and director based in Melbourne. Relic is her debut feature. She is next set to direct a feature-length version of her 2018 Japanese folk horror short film, Drum Wave.

Tupaia’s Endeavour

World Premiere (Director’s Cut)

Lala Rolls’ fascinating quest to examine what happens to a Tahitian high priest and navigator when he travels across the pacific – and further on towards England as a translator and guest (or is it as a living trophy?) – aboard Captain James Cook’s HMS Endeavour.

This new feature-length film, re-edited from director Lala Rolls’ earlier Māori TV series, now includes enlightening new material which helps us understand Tupaia’s fateful journey and pre-European Polynesian navigation.

Using a rich array of documentary tools, Rolls freely re-imagines Tupaia’s experience with the help of actor Kirk Torrance as Tupaia. She also weaves in the personal journey of artist Michel Tuffery, who travels to modern day Raiatea following the traces of his own family connections to the historical figure.

With Tuffery, Rolls seeks to pluck Tupaia from the side-lines of history to which he’d been relegated by the British version of Cook’s voyage, and restore him to a rightful place of honour as a guiding force in Cook’s exploration of the Pacific. Along the way, Tupaia’s descendants assert ownership of Tupaia’s personal taonga, which now rest in British museums having been attributed to the collection of Joseph Banks on the Endeavour’s return to London.

Tupaia’s Endeavour retells what we think is a familiar story, but from the point of view of the Pacific people who lived it, and of their contemporary descendants who seek a deeper understanding of their ancestor, and his role in shaping history. — Marten Rabarts

About the Filmmaker

Lala Rolls is a Fijian-born director and editor. Her filmmaking explores Polynesian and Māori culture, most notably in the documentaries Children of the Migration (2004) and Land of My Ancestors (2007), both of which premiered at NZIFF.
The near and present danger of Israel’s 1982 invasion of Lebanon is the nerve-wracking backdrop to this expertly directed coming-of-age tale, centred on one boy’s all-consuming crush amidst the encroachment of war.

On the last day of school, heightened by end of term exams, 11-year-old Wissam has only one thing on his mind: to confess his feelings to classmate Joanna. Fumbling comically through love notes and best laid plans with his friend Majid belies the very real threat of war on the horizon. Wissam’s teacher Yesmine (Lebanese star Nadine Labaki, director of the Cannes-winning Capharnaüm) and the faculty try to keep a lid on their emotions and see out the day. But as radio reports grow grimmer, distant explosions edge closer and then the sudden, deafening roar of fighter jets drowns out everything, reality sets in and their attention turns to how to get the children to safety.

With an outstanding command of tension, director Oualid Mouaness – drawing on his own experience as a kid in Beirut – brings to life a collective memory of personal and political fear for civilians on the ground that fateful day. Unnerving sound design lends a knife-edge quality to even the stillest moments, while the film’s recreation of the surrealism of chaos, seen from both young and adult points of view, is riveting – and instantly relatable for anyone who knows the feeling, in times of panic and uncertainty, of wanting to get home.

About the Filmmaker
Oualid Mouaness is a Liberian-born producer, writer and director who grew up in Lebanon. His short film The Rifle, The Jackal, The Wolf, and the Boy was shortlisted for an Oscar in 2017. He has also produced music videos for David Bowie, Annie Lennox, Lana Del Rey and Justin Timberlake. 1982 is his feature debut as a director.
Racial and psychological tensions, claustrophobically observed in both the workplace and at home, come to a head in Visar Morina’s masterfully directed thriller about one man’s identity crisis as a foreigner in Germany.

Are you ready for a virtuosic masterclass in sustained discomfort? From Exile’s opening scene, where chemical engineer Xhafer walks home through his bucolic German suburb only to find a dead rat hanging from his front gate, there’s no escape in this immaculately crafted pressure cooker.

Born in Kosovo, Xhafer (Mišel Matičević, in a compelling, controlled performance) begins to see racism around every corner. But where he finds microaggressions, gaslighting and hatred at every turn, his German wife (Toni Erdmann’s Sandra Hüller) only sees paranoia and honest mistakes. As it becomes clear Xhafer is no innocent himself, the line between real and imagined slights blurs, and his simmering anger slowly rises to a boil.

Director Visar Morina – writing from personal experience as a German immigrant from Kosovo – has gained comparisons to masters of unease like Michael Haneke and Ruben Östlund. But with a canny use of sustained tracking shots and a minimal yet striking score, Morina’s unique voice shines as he builds relentlessly rising tension. It’s an unlikely comparison, but in many ways Exile resembles 2020’s The Invisible Man: it’s what you can’t see that can drive you mad. — Doug Dillaman

About the Filmmaker
Visar Morina was born in Kosovo and studied at the Cologne Academy of Media Arts. His debut Babai (2015) received multiple awards, including Best Director and European Cinema Label in Karlovy Vary and Best Script at Filmfest München. Exile is his second feature.
Heroic Losers

After being scammed into bankruptcy, a community of working-class Argentines band together to devise the ultimate payback – an elaborate money heist inspired by the movies – in Sebastián Borensztein’s winning underdog comedy.

Ricardo Darín, Argentina’s rustic leading everyman and no stranger to the crime-caper genre, stars in this endearing, old-timey heist movie about sticking it to the man. When Darín and his hardworking neighbours are fleeced of their life savings on the eve of the country’s 2001 financial crisis, the future looks grim, until they get a tip-off that the devious lawyer who swindled their cash has hidden it all in an underground vault, presumably for a rainy day. Revenge has never felt so satisfying – or sweetly ironic – as the titular losers plot to reclaim what’s rightfully theirs on the night of a torrential downpour.

“Empathetic and entertaining... Heroic Losers’ always timely, universally relatable tale goes a considerable way. Pitting ordinary folks against the rich, powerful and unscrupulous has long given Robin Hood-style stories an appealing glow, as has exploring the economic disparity and potential for corruption inherent in such class clashes... Transforming bleak reality into an uplifting fantasy... it’s pure cathartic escapism...[and] when the central heist clicks into gear, the film cracks its way into rousing territory.” — Sarah Ward, Screendaily

About the Filmmaker
Just 6.5

A box office behemoth in its homeland and a daring breakthrough for its 30-year-old director Saeed Roustayi, this visceral policer tackles the maelstrom of Iran’s war on drugs through propulsive action and real political bite.

Opening at breakneck pace as a police officer chases a suspect on foot through the back alleys of Tehran, Just 6.5 crackles with relentless intensity. Iran’s exploding drug use – in this case, its epidemic of crack addiction – forms the backdrop to this riveting blend of police procedural and gripping bureaucratic thriller, following the efforts of a handful of cops to bust their way up the drug hierarchy.

As irascible a bunch as you’ll see on screen anywhere, the investigators are nominally led by Samad (A Separation’s Peyman Maadi), who has to overcome his own challenges amid the police bureaucracy even as he catches, jails and loudly threatens his quarry. Samad and his colleagues arrest and flip their way from user to dealer to courier in search of an elusive kingpin, with Just 6.5 – somewhat sarcastically named after Iran’s 6.5 million addicts – earning comparisons to classics like The French Connection and offering unique insights into the specifics of Iran’s police and justice system. Familiar genre beats are skillfully handled as cops and crims vie for supremacy in grotesquely overcrowded jail cells, and in cat-and-mouse encounters as thrilling as the busts setting them in motion. — Steve Newall

About the Filmmaker
Saeed Roustayi is a graduate of filmmaking from Soureh Film College. His debut feature film, Life and A Day (2016), won nine main awards at Tehran’s Fajr Film Festival, as well as accolades from the Iranian Film Awards and Iranian Film Critics ceremonies. To the Ends of the Earth

Personal, cultural and imagined fears are brought to the scenic surface of Kurosawa Kiyoshi’s superb new film, about a young woman navigating the customs and language of a foreign country while on assignment there as the host of a TV show.

Kurosawa Kiyoshi, the prolific auteur behind such modern Japanese masterpieces as Cure and Tokyo Sonata, takes his enduring fascination with psychological dread into a new realm with this enormously satisfying drama shot on location in Uzbekistan.

Exploring the idea of culture clash as a state of mind, Kurosawa’s latest gets inside the head of Yoko (Maeda Atsuko), a TV reporter touring the central Asian country with a crew from Tokyo. As they move from region to region, shooting shallow lifestyle and sightseeing segments for a travel show, cracks in Yoko’s forced on-camera delivery, and in the frustrated crew’s morale, begin to appear. Yoko’s alienation, compounded by the language barrier (Uzbek dialogue is intentionally not subtitled for effect) and the oppressive stares of locals, is expertly crafted in scenes that pinpoint the unease of existing in a totally unfamiliar place, but with an added complexity that Yoko’s anxiety might be projected, and not necessarily the result of being an unwanted woman and foreigner in a strange land. Building to a series of bold emotional flourishes in its third act, To the Ends of the Earth earns both its tension and humour in surprising yet profoundly relatable ways. — Tim Wong

About the Filmmaker
A bumbling thief plots to infiltrate a mausoleum built inexplicably on top of his buried loot in Alaa Eddine Aljem’s delightful, deadpan tale of spirituality and greed in rural Morocco.

Landing somewhere between the drollery of Aki Kaurismäki and the surreal spin on crime and punishment perfected by the Coens, this tight little caper is a genuine calling card for its debut director Alaa Eddine Aljem. His brand of gentle absurdity is caked into the very premise: a thief, running low on time as the cops close in, buries a bag of stolen cash on a hill in the desert, fashioning a makeshift grave with rocks to better identify the spot later. When he’s finally released from prison, he returns to the spot to collect... only to discover that locals have mistaken his assembly of random rubble as a miracle grave for a non-existent saint. Not only have they erected a lavish shrine above the hiding place, but an entire village has been built below.

As the thief and his dim-witted accomplice begin a long-winded stake-out, Aljem expands the scope to involve a cast of oddball villagers, all unnamed archetypes whose fates converge in a manner perfectly befitting of the film’s fable-like structure. With a light comic touch, Aljem strings up the absurdity of blind faith while unearthing the humanity that draws us to such beliefs in the first place. A real find. — Judah Finnigan

About the Filmmaker
Alaa Eddine Aljem is a Moroccan director best known for the award-winning short film The Desert Fish (2015), which took the Critics, Screenwriting and Grand prizes at the Moroccan National Film Festival. The Unknown Saint is his first feature.
Charter

Dramatising the turbulence and ambiguity of custody battles with emotional precision and complexity, Charter focuses on a mother’s impulsive decision to abscond with her estranged children to a holiday resort, and the consequences of her actions.

In this vividly tense and realist follow-up to her outstanding debut feature Sami Blood (NZIFF17), writer/director Amanda Kernell deftly considers the fraught intersection of motherhood and self-determination.

It’s been months since Alice has seen her children when she gets a distressed call from her young son. She races north to ensure her children’s safety, only to find her bitter ex-husband prohibiting her from seeing them. With only a week until the final custody verdict, Alice makes the desperate decision to abduct her children and spend the week vacationing together in the Canary Islands, reconnecting and convincing them she can be a good mother, whatever that means.

Charter is at once a stressful character drama, a mother-daughter love story, and a frenetic on-the-run film about betrayal and forgiveness. Ane Dahl Torp is excellent as the magnetic, complex Alice, an imperfect mother torn between independence and responsibility. First-time actor Tintin Poggats Sarri, too, is a standout as Alice’s surly 14-year-old daughter, Elina. Throughout the film, Alice and Elina perform a delicate dance of trust, heightened by the daunting possibility that their illegal escapade could fall apart at any moment. — Amanda Jane Robinson

In this fiery conversation starter, tough ethical quandaries agitate the sophisticated New York lives of three friends, whose best intentions behind a surrogate pregnancy are complicated when nature intrudes.

Selected for SXSW 2020, Jeremy Hersh’s debut feature missed out on a prestigious premiere slot when the hip Austin festival became one of the earliest COVID event casualties. We’re pleased to bring his thoughtful human drama to our At Home — Online edition.

With their roots in the New York theatre scene clear to see, Hersh and his terrific cast bite deep into a rich layer cake of issues, requiring the audience to interrogate their own responses to the choices confronting the characters; choices that would challenge the legendary wisdom of Solomon.

Jess (Jasmine Batchelor) is thrilled to be bearing a child for her best friends, gay couple Josh (Chris Perfetti) and Aaron (Sullivan Jones), until their perfectly modern arrangement flounders on an unexpected prenatal diagnosis of a birth disorder. When nobody is wrong, and no answer is right, how do you do the right thing? The Surrogate is intelligent, heartbreaking and entirely human. — Marten Rabarts

“Hersh’s briskly economical yet intensely emotional film... [is] without an ounce of preachiness or melodrama... [and] asks tough questions... in a manner... always compelling and grounded in a firm foundation of what feels like authentic experience.” — David Rooney, Hollywood Reporter

About the Filmmaker
Jeremy Hersh is a New York filmmaker. His undergraduate thesis film Natives premiered at SXSW in 2013, and was followed by the acclaimed short Actresses (2015). Partly crowdfunded on Kickstarter, The Surrogate is his debut feature film.
In Kosovo, the pressure on a mother to conceive, from both her conservative family and superstitious village community, builds with intensity in this nightmarish, emotionally charged drama tackling themes of war, trauma and oppressive gender roles.

A taut, suspenseful drama about the toll war can take on a mother, Zana is set in a small Kosovar village and follows Lume as she attempts to conceive a child ten years after losing her young daughter in the war. With medical assistance failing, the taciturn Lume reluctantly turns to the mysticism of a traditional healer in an effort to appease her mother-in-law's desperation for a grandchild. In her attempts to fall pregnant, Lume finds her repressed trauma rising rapidly to the surface, straining her relationships and violently disrupting her state of mind.

With an exquisite lead performance by the compelling Adriana Matoshi, Zana is a deeply personal portrait of a mother’s grief in the shadow of wartime trauma. A survivor of the war which killed her mother and sister, director Antoneta Kastrati brings a visceral authenticity to the film, lodging the viewer in Lume’s unravelling spirit with crisp cinematography and harrowing dream sequences. Zana is a deft turn towards drama from Kastrati – a long-time documentarian – and a gripping study of the cavernous connection between mother and child. — Amanda Jane Robinson

Lessons of Love

This surprisingly touching romantic odyssey documents charismatic Jola, a stylish sexagenarian embracing newly won love and liberation after an abusive, decades-long marriage.

When the title of Polish documentary Lessons of Love first appears, it seems ironic. Jola, a strong-willed and intimidatingly fashionable Polish woman nearing her seventies, has just fled her Italian country home and her four-decade marriage to a truly hideous man. Compellingly captured by co-directors Małgorzata Goliszewska and Kasia Mateja, we follow Jola to her hometown where a relationship with another man begins to flourish. It’s here that the title sheds its irony as the tremulous early throes of true love begin to manifest for the first time in their lives.

A thrillingly woozy romance, Lessons of Love excels in its refusal to adhere to expectations, much like its central subject. The composed filmmaking captures the spirit of a woman rebelling against the conservatism of her generation, where divorces don’t happen and women don’t speak out against their husbands. Jola is a tremendous subject, her magnetic presence allowing only occasional glimpses of vulnerability; the vulnerability of a woman opening herself up to something new. The relationship between Jola and her new amour Wojtek is a marvel, captured in warm, candid conversations by its patient observers. — Tom Augustine

Defying family expectations and maternal norms, 63-year-old hairdresser Lou travels to start a new life abroad, settling on the Spanish port city of Cádiz, where adventures in language and friendship await.

In the empowering spirit of Educating Rita and Gloria, this sun-soaked Dutch dramedy follows sexagenarian Lou Welter (Loes Luca), who arrives in Cádiz seeking to rediscover the magical feeling she had when she visited there as a child with her father. However, any initial frisson quickly fades. Living with her host family proves intolerable and Lou instantly finds herself offside with her Spanish course tutor Andrea Cruz (Elvira Minguez), especially after she is the one who has to bail Lou out of her accommodation bind.

Gradually finding her feet, a rooftop room and friendship, both with fellow (and much younger) language students and a gaggle of Pilates classmates, Lou’s newfound bliss is then threatened by the unannounced arrival of her pregnant daughter.

Director Norbert ter Hall and actress-turned-screenwriter Roos Ouwehand have crafted a charming character study which makes clever use of sound and focus to evoke the excitement, confusion and fear of arriving in a new city. It’s also a fabulous showcase for Minguez and Luca, who get plenty of moments to shine in authentic and substantive lead roles that, as ter Hall rightly points out, rarely exist for women of their age. — James Croot

About the Filmmaker
Gymnastics, an unknown half-brother and a streak of petty crime set in motion a teenage girl’s coming-of-age in suburban Brighton, in Eva Riley’s sensitive, spirited first feature film.

The debut feature from Scottish writer/director Eva Riley, Perfect 10 is set in Brighton. But don’t expect fun at the pier: this is the outskirts. Following in the strong tradition of British social realism, the film is about Leigh, an aspiring teen gymnast who is up against it. As if the nasty bullies on her squad aren’t enough to deal with, Leigh is lonely and struggling to cope with a complicated home life. The fraught family dynamic is further destabilised by the arrival of a half-brother, Joe. Leigh didn’t know he even existed and soon he and his even older mates are partying in the lounge.

Haunted by absence, and driven by an unruly longing to belong, newcomer Frankie Box compels as Leigh. The camera stays close to her youthful, increasingly reckless, energy. Joe is involved in petty crime and she starts to tag along. Brother and sister’s growing sense of kinship is underpinned by something volatile and dangerous, much like the motorbikes they start to steal. Leigh is bound to fall (and does) but this is a narrative that takes some unexpected, affirming turns. Life might not be perfect, but Leigh gains confidence and balance and sticks the landing.

About the Filmmaker
Eva Riley is a Scottish director and screenwriter, based in Brighton. She graduated from the National Film and Television School in 2015, with her final year film Patriot premiering in competition at Cannes. Her short films have screened at festivals including London, Edinburgh and Telluride.
Nourishing and unexpectedly moving, Marta Pulk’s documentary takes us to theatre-mad Estonia, where a young, inexperienced woman wins a job to watch and critique every theatre production in a calendar year.

A Year Full of Drama revolves around an experiment in the form of a job listing: a paid position for someone who has never been to the theatre before, to watch and review theatre full-time for a year.

Hundreds of applications from across Estonia pour in and a candidate is selected: 21-year-old Alissija, a magnetic, working class girl from a rural, Russian-speaking family. Adrift and curious, she packs up and moves to the capital for a year-long immersion into the country’s performing arts scene.

This intimate documentary charts Alissija’s coming of age as she contests with loneliness, doubt and writer’s block. “I don’t know how to live,” she declares, more than once. Through patient, perceptive camerawork, we watch as Alissija settles into her role as audience member and critic. As the months pass, the shows she attends begin to provoke a questioning of her own life; her traumas, fears and ambitions. One year and 224 shows later, she is a changed woman.

With its gentle pace and poignant observations, director Marta Pulk’s empathetic portrait of a young person coming into their own is energising and honest, making a strong case for the notion that art really can transform a life. — Amanda Jane Robinson

Corinna Harfouch is unforgettable as a mother reaching out, in her own severe way, to her classical pianist son and her own erstwhile artistic ambitions, in director Jan-Ole Gerster’s high-tensile drama.

A lacerating character study of a contentious woman, Lara is a thoroughly compelling drama that spans a day in its eponymous heroine’s life. It’s not just any day: Lara is turning 60, although this gives her little reason to celebrate. More importantly, that evening her son Victor, a virtuoso pianist, will perform an original composition for the first time. However, Lara isn’t invited and Victor has been ignoring her calls – for weeks. But on Victor’s big night, Lara shall not be shunned.

Lara’s complex and unnerving personality is revealed through her interactions with former work colleagues, a cab driver neighbour, her ex-husband, her mother and her own piano teacher, among others, each encounter adding a brushstroke to the portrait. The picture, while not pretty, is engrossing: monstrous castrating mother, envious of and undermining her son’s talents which she spent years moulding; an embittered woman riddled with thwarted ambition; a manipulative boss who once filled her underlings with fear, possibly just because she could. Corinna Harfouch’s nuanced performance makes Lara entirely believable and in less accomplished directorial hands, this tale could have swerved into farce or melodrama. Lara has her reasons, and although not necessarily defensible, she completely fascinates. — Sandra Reid

About the Filmmaker
Jan-Ole Gerster is a German director based in Berlin. His debut feature, Oh Boy (NZIFF12), starring Tom Schilling, was a surprise hit on the international festival circuit. Lara is his second feature film.
A heavyweight drama elevated by two outstanding performers, Lars Eidinger (The Clouds of Sils Maria) joins Nina Hoss (celebrated star of Barbara and Phoenix) as inseparable twins fighting serious illness with their undying passion for the theatre.

A brilliant playwright, Lisa (Nina Hoss) no longer writes. She lives in Switzerland with her family but her heart has stayed in Berlin, beating to the rhythm of her twin brother’s heart. The deep ties between the twins have grown even stronger since Sven (Lars Eidinger) was diagnosed with an aggressive type of leukaemia, for which Lisa as his twin has naturally provided bone marrow. He’s a famous theatre actor and while he struggles through the aftermath of the transplant, Lisa starts to move heaven and earth to get him back on stage, which she believes is the place where he most truly lives.

She will give her all for her soulmate to the point of obsession; neglecting everything else, even risking her marriage to Martin (Jens Albinus), her children and the relationship with her self-absorbed but well-meaning mother (Marthe Keller, deftly adding a light touch as her twin children struggle with questions of life and death). Hoss and Eidinger seem to revel in the meaty material and deliver nothing less than absolute authenticity and truth from the first dramatic note to the last. — Swiss Films/Marten Rabarts

Ginevra Elkann’s lovely directorial debut, set in the early 90s and based on her own childhood, finds three siblings arriving in Rome from Paris on a visit to their unreliable father, where family tensions and spontaneous fun mix.

Peppy 8-year-old Alma (Oro De Commarque, an adorable new face to remember) prays secretly for the reunion of her divorced parents over one indelible winter in this brisk, instantly appealing family drama. Torn between France and Italy, Alma and her two older brothers are shipped off by their pregnant – and very Catholic – mother to spend time with their father (Riccardo Scamarcio), a struggling screenwriter whose parenting skills also lack finesse. What unfolds, to everyone’s surprise, is a freewheeling season of beach outings, daytrips to Rome and joyrides with a gang of cooler, older kids, one of whom Alma falls for and fantasises about their future marriage alongside the day her parents will renew their vows.

Directing with a remarkable lightness of touch, Ginevra Elkann guides her ensemble cast (which includes The Wonders’ Alba Rohrwacher and Fleabag’s greasy Brett Gelman) through scene after scene of effortless naturalism and mischief. No single event in If Only feels outlandish or contrived, a testament to its portrayal of the way the fondest memories often feel incidental in the moment and only later – like the charms of this splendid first feature – catch you off guard.

About the Filmmaker
Ginevra Elkann (notably a granddaughter of Gianni Agnelli, founder of Fiat) is an Italian producer and director. She was assistant to Bernardo Bertolucci on Besieged (1998), and currently chairs the production companies Asmara Films and Good Films. If Only is her directorial feature debut.
Intrigued by cruise ships and the people who frequent them, Sophie Dros’ fascinating documentary focuses on an extravagant Scottish Baron whose love of luxury liners masks a very human need for affection and validation.

The massive cruise ships that slink by each other in King of the Cruise resemble floating micro-societies where, as director Sophie Dros puts it, “passengers are confined... with a few thousand people who don’t really know each other. There is no escape. Which does not seem to bother anyone.” Whether the notion of the cruise appeals or revolts, this entertaining documentary invites us to set sail.

Among the passengers is Ronald Busch Reisinger, an avid cruise fan. This larger-than-life personality, both in his body mass and in the seemingly outlandish stories that he tells, is quick to announce to anyone who’ll listen: “I own a county.” Whether sporting a kilt as Baron of Inneryne or a royal red cloak as king of a bit of land in Africa, he is a striking and incongruous figure. As the film coolly observes life aboard, from waiters cajoling breakfasting patrons with “happy coffee!” to motivational pep talks about exercise delivered to folk becalmed in their chairs, in his cabin, the Baron’s garrulous façade slips. Ultimately, despite being “born with a gold spoon” in his mouth, in his search for recognition and to fend off loneliness, Ronnie resembles any other common mortal. — Sandra Reid

An ancient doomsday prophecy haunts Australian lawyer Richard Chamberlain while freakish weather plagues Sydney in Peter Weir’s newly remastered murder mystery-turned-apocalyptic chiller from 1977.

As relevant today as it was more than 40 years ago on first release, Peter’s Weir’s supernatural Australian classic returns newly remastered from the original 35mm interpositive.

“Opening with the uncanny sight of a sunny, cloudless sky erupting into a torrential ice storm, Australian New Waver Peter Weir’s hallucinatory follow up to Picnic at Hanging Rock is part murder mystery, part apocalyptic chiller. When he agrees to defend a group of Aboriginal men charged with homicide, a Sydney lawyer (Richard Chamberlain) is plunged into a shadow world of secret societies, shamanic rituals, and an ancient doomsday prophecy. And then the black rain starts to fall… Surely one of the wettest films ever made – nearly every frame is drenched in ominous, aqueous imagery – The Last Wave sustains an air of dream-state dread as it builds towards its brain-bending climax.” — Film at Lincoln Center

“Strange, foreboding and brilliantly different from any film ever made in Australia, The Last Wave is time past, future and present, a mingling of Aboriginal Dreamtime, Revelations, doomsday predictions and the Deluge.” — Sydney Morning Herald, 1977

About the Filmmaker
Peter Weir is one of Australia’s most important directors. A leading figure in the Australian New Wave, the success of his early films such as Picnic at Hanging Rock (1975) and A Year of Living Dangerously (1983) led to Oscar-nominated works like Witness (1985) and The Truman Show (1998). Other key films include Dead Poets Society (1989), Fearless (1993) and Master & Commander (2003).
In this fresh cinephilic appreciation, French film critic Michel Ciment’s taped interviews with Stanley Kubrick breathe new life into the legacy of one of the most celebrated and studied directors of all time.

If you’re wondering what more can be said about filmmaking giant Stanley Kubrick, Gregory Monro’s documentary – hot on the heels of the equally fascinating Filmworker (NZIFF18) – goes where few have been able to before: straight to the source.

Notoriously reclusive, Kubrick’s guarded genius has served to fuel endless theories and interpretations on the meaning of his cinema. Meanwhile, films like Room 237 have only deepened the mystery with their imaginative speculation on how Kubrick’s mind worked. Through rare audio recordings of the auteur in dialogue with Michel Ciment – a writer who had privileged access to Kubrick over 30 years – Kubrick by Kubrick allows the director to illuminate his work, both graciously and with an air of finality, in his own words.

Film excerpts from all the classics are elegantly combined with crisp insights into creative practice, but it’s what’s revealed in the intellectual rapport between Kubrick and Ciment that is the surprise revelation here. Their relaxed conversational flow, running counter to the taciturn image instilled by the legend, finds Kubrick at his most open, humble and philosophical, and is a testament to Ciment’s renown as the Kubrick authority.

Mayor

By turns comedic and Kafkaesque, this fly-on-the-wall doco observes the fortunes of Ramallah, an epicentre of Palestinian commerce and culture, and its tireless mayor, whose work to better the city is met with danger and frustration.

Shadowing the likeable, assiduous Musa Hadid on his day-to-day leadership of the West Bank’s de facto Palestinian capital, Mayor is a grounded portrait of a municipality in action, and a not-so-average tour through the practical realities of life under occupation. From its calmly matter-of-fact perspective, the charming mundanity of local body politics contrasts harshly with the geopolitical minefield that is the Israeli–Palestinian conflict. Ramallah, perched only a few miles north of Jerusalem, remains conspicuously in the crossfire.

Shooting over two years during Hadid’s second term, director David Osit’s roving camera finds riveting drama in the juxtapositions between dryly entertaining council meetings, city plans for Christmas celebrations (roughly a quarter of its citizens are Christians, Hadid among them), an official visit from Prince William, and the heavy blow of Trump’s decision to recognise Jerusalem as Israel’s capital. The gravity of the situation pulls into sharp focus during sudden moments of military engagement, but it’s the grace and good humour of Mayor Hadid, whose city continues to thrive against the odds, that gives this documentary a stirring life force of its own. — Tim Wong

Extraordinary cinema from filmmakers out to make a difference, or simply be different.

Many are new and diverse voices; some from parts of the globe where artistic freedom isn’t necessarily a given.

Others inspire through bold creative choices or are heroes in the eyes of the marginalised communities they represent.
“Algorithmic justice” is one of the most important civil rights issues today, says computer scientist and digital activist Joy Buolamwini, in this accessible and compelling documentary about artificial intelligence and the biased algorithms that power it.

Joy Buolamwini, who found that facial recognition software does not ‘see’ dark-skinned faces, is one of the activists challenging gender and racial bias in the decision-making software that increasingly impacts on our lives.

We travel to London, where police trialling facial recognition surveillance apprehend innocent, mostly black, people for questioning. In New York, an apartment tower manager requires residents to submit to a biometric security system. But people are fighting back. In Hong Kong, pro-democracy protesters confuse and disable facial recognition software by waving laser pointers and spraying the lenses of CCTV cameras.

Inequitable algorithms developed by white men using “pale, male datasets” are also used to sort college applications, rank resumés, set insurance premiums and evaluate prisoner recidivism risk. Unsurprisingly, the technology repeatedly fails people with non-white skin, women and youth.

How relevant is this to New Zealand? In May this year, our police conducted a trial of Clearview AI’s facial recognition software – which illegally uses images scraped from social networks – without consulting the Police Commissioner or the Privacy Commissioner. — Rebecca Priestley

Dark City Beneath the Beat

The untold story of Baltimore club music is brought to ecstatic life against the backdrop of the city’s depression, and through the black and LGTBQI+ communities galvanised by musical expression, in TT the Artist’s bristling documentary.

If you’ve watched The Wire or read the crime stats, then the picture you have of the city of Baltimore will be a dark one indeed. This high-energy, rhythmically-propelled and dazzlingly colourful film doesn’t deny that picture, but it shows a vibrant cultural community that is persisting in spite of it.

TT the Artist (aka Tedra Wilson) is a singer, rapper, producer and now filmmaker who for the past decade or so has been a force in the Baltimore dance and music scene. In her directorial debut she takes us on a quick-fire tour of her world. We meet DJ/producer Mighty Mark, who demonstrates how to make a Baltimore Club beat, which dictates the film’s pulse, visually as much as sonically.

Polished set pieces are dovetailed with raw actuality, like the heats for the King and Queen of Baltimore dance contests. With sparing use of dialogue, much of the story is left for the viewer to intuit, but the personal testimony in the songs, or a dance involving a rapper and an armed cop, say everything that is needed.

Dark City Beneath the Beat feels hopeful, even uplifting, but this is art born out of desperation. As one of the subjects says: “We dance in the streets because we don’t have anywhere else to go.” — Nick Bollinger

About the Filmmaker
TT the Artist, is a leading voice in the Baltimore music scene. She has worked with Grammy Award-winning producer Diplo and high profile musical acts as well as directed, produced and edited many of her own music videos.
Hong Kong Moments

Vivid and strikingly objective, Zhou Bing’s in-the-field documentary covering both sides of Hong Kong’s pro-democracy Umbrella Movement examines the personal and political identities at odds in this ongoing conflict.

Hong Kong Moments follows seven of its citizens during the city’s 2019 protests as activists flooded the streets to rally against a controversial extradition bill – one which stood to undermine their civil rights granted under the “one country, two systems” arrangement with Mainland China. Over two protest days leading up to local elections, the documentary’s seven subjects – a frontline protestor, two politicians, a police officer and a volunteer first aider among them – express how the protests affect them as filtered through their own personal contexts, revealing a web of clashing opinions aggravated by generational divide, but united by a loyalty to their Hong Kong identity.

This documentary is not a primer or historical lesson. Rather, interwoven moments of our protagonists going about their day – snapshots of police brutality, conversations between shop owners and customers, and the juxtaposition of pro-Beijing and pro-democracy campaigning – elegantly convey both the micro anxieties of daily life and the high stakes of this moment in history. It’s a timely feature in more ways than one: though ending on a hopeful note, a Chinese-imposed national security bill recently approved means protests still rage on as we watch this. — Jean Teng

The great Ai Weiwei, giant of contemporary Chinese, activist and human rights art, directs with breathtaking outrage this soul-searching documentary on the devastation of a Mexican community gutted by a mass abduction of students.

In 2014, students from the Ayotzinapa Rural Teachers’ College in Mexico were attacked by masked assailants and police forces while travelling through the town of Iguala, Guerrero, leaving six dead. Forty-three students were abducted, never to be seen again. World-renowned Chinese artist and filmmaker Ai Weiwei visits the Guerrero region to craft an affecting and gut-wrenching document of this tragedy through the families of the students.

Through intimate interviews with the families, Ai allows their grief and trauma to be given a voice, and allows us to bear witness to this scandal, where a corrupt government’s investigation is seen as more a cover-up. Vivos also shows the strength that the families draw from each other as they continue to fight for justice.

Ai, who has gifted the world stunning visual works across multiple disciplines, has always used his art to shine a spotlight onto human rights struggles. He provides stunning camerawork through the rural landscape of Mexico, as well as close-ups of these testimonies, lending incredible power to the quiet observational scenes of the lives of the families. Their stories of grief and cries for justice deserve to be heard loudly across the lands. — Vicci Ho

About the Filmmaker
China’s most famous artist, Ai Weiwei is internationally renowned as an activist, architect, curator and filmmaker. His best known works bring to light human rights abuses and actively critique the Chinese government. He has made numerous documentary works, including most recently the features The Rest (2019) and Human Flow (2017).
The Long Walk

Somehow both thoughtful and thrilling, Laotian-American filmmaker Mattie Do’s ghostly time-travel tale unravels into unexpected places, blending intimate drama with tense horror and sci-fi genre elements.

In a near-future Laos, one lonely man travels down a dusty country road as a silent young woman follows from a distance: a ghost who will soon transport him back to fix his painful past. We, too, follow the man – an old farmer – as he ventures into town to sell scrap bike parts for payment he receives via a chip in his wrist. Meanwhile, a neglected young boy holds the bloodied hand of a dying woman, later revealed as our pivotal ghost.

These are the tangled past and present timelines of The Long Walk’s unnamed protagonist; hazy fragments which blur and cross as the old man jumps back and forth to remedy the suffering of his dying mother, a childhood memory which leaves him so guilt-ridden, he copes in adulthood by quietly euthanising sick local women to relieve their pain. The changes the man makes in his fraught youth inadvertently trigger sinister alternate realities and reveal uncomfortable truths.

Do – Laos’ first and only female director – cleverly uses time travel to explore different shades of grief, personal and collective trauma set in a troubled country rarely seen on screen. Mysterious, meditative and lingering: a ghost story for more than just genre fans. — Jean Teng

About the Filmmaker
Los Angeles-born Mattie Do is a pioneering Laotian filmmaker who directed her debut feature – a horror film – in a country where horror movies were banned for decades. The Long Walk is her latest genre film. Selected filmography: Dearest Sister (2016), Chanthaly (2012).
Paradise Drifters

Exciting young director Mees Peijnenburg and ace cinematographer Jasper Wolf (*Monos; Instinct, NZIFF20) immerse us in the gritty world of a trio of disadvantaged Dutch youths en route to Marseille, where either hope or failure awaits.

Far from the canal houses and modernist villas where the well-heeled burghers of most Dutch cities reside, lies a different world. Here lives an unexpected underclass: young, ethnically mixed, struggling to survive having somehow missed the boat, bus or train to a better life than the one they were born into. From a script developed at the Cannes Cinéfondation, Mees Peijnenburg, a talented director not much older than his young protagonists, scratches the underbelly of Europe and finds a festering wound hidden there. — Marten Rabarts

“Paradise Drifters introduces us to three young adults who have no sense of security or belonging in their lives. Chloe (van Waning) is pregnant. The relationship with her mother is revealed in a single encounter marked by anger and violence. Naive Lorenzo (Jonas Smulders) hero-worships his feckless older brother Ivan (Joren Seldeslachts). He will do anything to secure a better future for them when Ivan is released from prison. Anxious, introverted Yousef (Bilal Wahib) seems ill-prepared for the moment he leaves a care home and enters the world… There is a dynamic energy to Peijnenburg’s storytelling... [and] a documentary-like edge to [his] depiction of the tensions in the banlieues of Marseille.” — Allan Hunter, Screendaily

Mees Peijnenburg studied at the Netherlands Film Academy, where he made his award-winning graduation film, Even Cowboys Get to Cry (2013). Black Milk

On the Mongolian steppes, one woman’s cultural and sexual identity is reckoned with in Uisenma Borchu’s fierce, hypnotic drama of two sisters coming to terms with their expression of heritage and independence.

Mongolian-born, German-based filmmaker Uisenma Borchu is the star, writer and director of Black Milk, her deeply personal second feature. She plays Wessi, an immigrant disillusioned with her life in Germany, who returns to her nomadic homeland to visit her sister Ossi. Though overjoyed to be reunited, it does not take long for the more independent-minded Wessi to clash with her sibling over the traditions of her nomadic heritage that she left behind. As Wessi becomes attracted to a mysterious older man also living on the steppes, her sexual candour is both threatening and fascinating to the pregnant, more conservative Ossi. Meanwhile, the tribal elders are finding Wessi’s free-spirit something they need to bring under control.

Working with a largely non-professional cast, Borchu examines the complexities of reconciling feminism, culture and tradition with brutal honesty (be warned: there are graphic scenes of animal slaughter) and mythical whimsy. Blending realism and fantasy with sharp editing, Black Milk provides no easy answers, but leaves little doubt on how the two sisters, brilliantly played by Borchu and Gunsmaa Tsogzol, will always be there to love, support and inspire each other. — Vicci Ho

About the Filmmaker
Originally from Ulaanbaatar, Mongolia, Uisenma Borchu moved with her family to East Germany in 1988. Her debut film Don’t Look at Me That Way (2015) was lauded at the Bavarian Film Awards, and the Munich and Taipei film festivals. Black Milk is her second feature.
They Call Me Babu

Indonesia’s shifting colonial landscape is examined through startling archival footage and the remarkable story of one nanny who, while caring for a Dutch family, braved occupation and social upheaval to find her own independence.

A narrator’s voice speaking to her dead mother floats through this engaging and enlightening piece of cinema, harking back to ancient home movies and newsreels. Yet these artefacts are bound together to make a thoroughly modern statement. We follow the Indonesian babu (nanny) of the title, Alima, as she escapes an arranged marriage and seeks the opportunity to travel and broaden her horizons. The Dutch family with whom she is employed is symbolic of seemingly benevolent colonisers, yet are entrenched in the belief in their right to rule, even as World War II intervenes and sees the country overrun by another invading force. All the while we see Alima’s growth as an independent woman who, when allowed to be educated and have free thought, understands the shackles of colonisation must be thrown off to achieve real freedom.

Director Sandra Beerends has expertly assembled the testimonies of several nannies of this time and threads this through archival film prints which dance with life even as they reveal an age that has long since passed. In the end, we’re left with a profound and moving statement from a woman who speaks with a voice of clear conviction for self-determination. — Chris Hormann

About the Filmmaker
Sandra Beerends is a script editor, creative producer and writer/director who works for the Dutch broadcaster NTR and runs her own company, Beruang. They Call Me Babu is her debut feature as a writer/director.
You Will Die at Twenty

Sudanese filmmaker Amjad Abu Alala’s beautifully realised fable of a child living with the knowledge his life will end the moment he becomes an adult is a coming-of-age tale like no other.

Condemned to an early death from birth, young Muzamil waits despairingly for the day he will turn 20 and die. His father, grief-stricken by the holy prophecy, has already abandoned him, while his mother mourns her son in the only way she knows how — to protect him from the world. Hope flickers in the Quran, which Muzamil is eventually granted permission to study, and the gentle paternal friendship of Suleiman, a village elder who opens his eyes to the joys of cinema. As adulthood draws nearer for the teenager, we come to understand Muzamil’s fate is held not so much in the fear of dying, but living — a notion, neither spiritual nor secular in tone, that shrouds this haunting poem of a film.

“The visual assurance of You Will Die at Twenty is the most immediately notable element of Sudanese director Amjad Abu Alala’s accomplished feature debut. Beautifully composed and boasting the kind of sensitivity to light sources and color tonalities usually ascribed to top photographers, the film lovingly depicts the remote east-central region of Sudan as a quasi-magical place of sand, sky and the colors of the Nile... a touching, nonjudgmental depiction of people circumscribed by superstition.” — Jay Weissberg, Variety

About the Filmmaker
Amjad Abu Alala is a Sudanese director and producer. Among his short films, Studio (2012) was developed in a workshop under the supervision of Abbas Kiarostami. He currently heads the Programming Committee in the Sudan Independent Film Festival and is Sudan’s representative at the Arab Film Institute.
No Hard Feelings

Understated yet emotionally resonant, Faraz Shariat’s semi-autobiographical coming-of-age drama is both timely in its exploration of a global humanitarian crisis and a testament to the transformative power of queer love.

When we have no choice about the life we are born into, what choice do we have in the life we want to live? Faraz Shariat’s assured debut feature examines this by setting a queer love story against the realities of life as an immigrant in modern-day Germany. With dreamy cinematography that invokes summer crushes and stolen moments, No Hard Feelings is at turns sexy and romantic but nevertheless refuses to let its characters escape the pasts they are running from.

As a second-generation Irani-German millennial, Parvis has struggled to understand his heritage. Instead, he seeks solace in gay clubs and casual hook-ups. Sentenced to community service at a shelter for refugees, it’s there he meets the smouldering Amon and his older sister Banafshe, recent arrivals from Iran. As the trio’s friendship blossoms, Parvis is confronted with a glimpse of what his life could have been had his parents not fled Iran, while a burgeoning love affair with Amon begins, even as the threat of deportation looms. Shariat’s light directorial touch eschews audience manipulation for clear-eyed reality, allowing the characters’ fates to unfurl organically as they face a future that holds both hope and disappointment. — Chris Tse

About the Filmmaker
Growing up in Germany the son of exiled Iranis, Faraz Shariat studied media art to explore his experiences as a gay, second generation migrant. For No Hard Feelings, he won Best Feature Film at the FIRST STEPS Award 2019, Germany’s most important film prize for young filmmakers.

Juenglinge Film
Director Ray Yeung breaks new ground with Suk Suk (‘uncle’ in Cantonese), an affecting portrayal of two gay men in modern Hong Kong as they find each other in their later years and struggle with enduring matters of identity, desire and belonging.

70-year-old married taxi driver Pak meets single-father Hoi, 65, on a park bench. The two embark on a friendship which quickly develops into a secret relationship, cautious but genuine: they swap stories during clandestine trysts at a gay sauna, laugh together while winding through the fruit stands of a wet market, and savour hidden moments of intimacy in secluded spaces.

But there are limitations to their love story. Hoi has a devoutly Christian son and a granddaughter he can’t lose; Pak is settled into the comfortable routine of a decades-long marriage. They’re skittish about spending time in public together, and when Hoi attends meetings led by a gay activist group, we better understand what it means to be out in Hong Kong society – and not just out, but out and without youth on your side.

Yeung’s third feature is culturally intelligent, depicting the realities of Pak and Hoi’s familial situations – framed by traditional Chinese values – without judgement, and instead explores different nuances of what it means to be happy with assuredness. Sure, it would have been easy to lean into melodrama, but Suk Suk never does; its smart observations lie in the intricacies of everyday lives. — Jean Teng

About the Filmmaker
Ray Yeung is a Hong Kong-born director. He received a master’s degree in filmmaking from Columbia University in 2008. His three feature films to date have explored queer representation in Chinese culture. Selected filmography: Front Cover (2015), Cut Sleeve Boys (2006).
Poignantly capturing the agony and ecstasy of the arts, Johnny Ma’s colourful ode to performing artists stars a real-life Sichuan Opera troupe struggling against modernity and bureaucracy on the outskirts of Chengdu, China.

Tough, tenacious Zhao Li manages a Sichuan Opera troupe. Staging cheap and cheerful performances for an aging community in a rundown venue keeps the tradition alive. But times are changing for her theatre and its misfit outfit. Notwithstanding Zhao’s rascal husband, whose face-changing side gig at a hot pot restaurant is unfaithful to the operatic arts, or her beautiful niece, whose dreams of pop stardom see her moonlighting at a garish nightclub, the government has just notified her that the theatre is due to be demolished.

Discovering Zhao and her opera troupe in a documentary and casting them in a fictional reimagining of their artistic life, director Johnny Ma’s bittersweet drama portrays a funny, folksy company of actors holding onto precious old ways amid rapid social and economic change. The realities they face – dwindling attendance, unrelenting progress – aren’t so easily mitigated, but they can be momentarily escaped. Bursts of dreamy, fantastical sequences convey the feeling of stepping into another world – and transporting the audience along with you – that Zhao lives for as a performer. These joys and sorrows are lovingly rendered in this gentle, wistful musical film. — Tim Wong

Johnny Ma was born in Shanghai and raised in Canada. His award-winning debut feature, Old Stone (2016), won Best Canadian First Feature at the Toronto International Film Festival and Best First Feature at the Canadian Screen Awards.
Family Members

Stranded after their mother’s passing, a teenage brother and sister awkwardly socialise, take long walks on the beach and get serious about fitness in this dry, Jim Jarmusch-esque hangout film.

Full of droll comic situations punctuating the stasis of a small seaside town, Family Members is a wry and gently absurdist look at sibling bonds in flux.

Somewhere on Argentina’s Atlantic coast, Gilda and Lucas return to their mother’s home, left vacant following her sudden death. On the beach, they reach into a box and ceremonially toss a prosthetic hand into the ocean – their mother’s, in lieu of ashes from her yet-to-be-cremated body. Later that day, when a drivers’ strike cancels all buses back to Buenos Aires, the pair decide to take an extended vacation in their new surroundings. Gilda makes the most of her free time meditating with chakra stones and perfecting nude selfies; Lucas, meanwhile, brags about his martial arts prowess to Guido, a local Instagram fitness guru and potential first love for the sexually frustrated teen.

Parties, fight clubs, tarot card readings and strange messages from a hole on the beach instigate a delicate tension between adolescence and mourning. Sweetly observing this state, Mateo Bendesky’s languid sophomore feature explores the forming of identity and a sense of self through the sibling’s shared grief and growing pains as young adults.

About the Filmmaker
Mateo Bendesky is a graduate filmmaker of Universidad del Cine. His shorts and features have screened at Cannes, Berlin, Toronto and Rotterdam film festivals, among others. He is currently developing La fiebre, his third feature film. Selected filmography: Acá adentro (2013).
Drama Girl

Playing outside the boundaries of drama and documentary, this adventurous self-portrait of a 20-something artist and dancer asks the question, “if you could star in the film of your life, how would you rewrite the script?”

With the explosion in popularity of docu-series centred on larger-than-life personalities, Vincent Boy Kars’ Drama Girl is a refreshing entry that toes the line between fantasy and non-fiction. Opening on leading lady Leyla de Muynck, we are introduced to the deceptively simple experiment: Leyla will play the title role in a film about her life.

As the film progresses, we understand Leyla has taken this opportunity to find closure from major life experiences that have stuck with her. But with ongoing input from behind the camera, one may begin to wonder how much agency Leyla has in retelling her own story. While the push and pull between star and director (largely) avoids confrontation, it does beg questions of authenticity, authorship and the ethical boundaries of documentary filmmaking. Alongside Kars’ interventions, could we as viewers be provoking Leyla for our own entertainment?

So is Kars’ film the critique of the medium he claims it to be, or is it a doco masquerading as an art piece? There are myriad ways to read the film. Whether you consider yourself a true cinephile or watch films for the simple joy of it, Drama Girl makes for a truly enjoyable, puzzling and entertaining watch. — Kailey Carruthers

About the Filmmaker
Vincent Boy Kars is a Dutch filmmaker whose films investigate identity, self-image and sexuality. His 2017 documentary Independent Boy also flirts with the borders between fiction and reality. Drama Girl is his second feature.
Sick, Sick, Sick

An intense teenage romance morphs into a hypnotic tale of resurrection and saudade in this visually lush meditation on all-consuming love from emerging Brazilian director Alice Furtado.

A fever dream of love sickness and female desire, Alice Furtado’s moody debut feature centres on Silvia (mesmerising newcomer Luiza Kosovski), a brooding teenager whose first love arrives in the form of bad boy Artur. Silvia’s attraction to this new and destabilising presence in the classroom is uncontrollable; they hook up immediately and spend every waking moment together, that is until Artur’s life is cut short by his haemophilia in an otherwise ordinary accident.

Exploring Silvia’s grief in a series of elegiac, slow-burning episodes, Furtado’s narrative draws blood from both genre film inspiration and personal heartbreak. Manifesting first literally in an unexplained illness, then existentially through an obsession with voodoo and bringing Artur back from the dead, Silvia’s journey from love to loss, and then loss to longing, metastasises as a kind of pure cinematic reverie.

Tutored by Claire Denis as a student, the influence of the French auteur’s sensual aesthetic runs deep in Furtado’s style, while echoes of horror touchstones I Walked with a Zombie and Pet Semetary quietly reverberate. A striking first film with a real sensibility for desire as an uncanny and intoxicating force.

About the Filmmaker
Alice Furtado is a filmmaker and editor. A graduate in cinema at Universidade Federal Fluminense (Brazil) and a post graduate at Le Fresnoy (France), her debut feature Sick, Sick, Sick premiered at Cannes in the Directors’ Fortnight section in 2019.

Bloody Nose, Empty Pockets

Turner Ross and Bill Ross IV (Western, NZIFF15) turn their instinctive, unblinking documentary lens on the patrons of a grimy Las Vegas bar enjoying one last round – a glorious snapshot of Americana that’s at once dark, moving and flat-out funny.

“When you get lonely, you have no friends, you can come to this bar and fit in here.” It’s a sentiment that could be spoken by any of the bar-room poets, veterans, drag queens, miscreants, hipsters and forces of nature that comprise the clientele of the Roaring 20s, a Vegas dive bar that time forgot. But what happens when the only place you belong is going away for good? The obvious answer: one final all-day, all-night party.

The Ross Brothers continue their winning streak of intimately observed, artfully shot documents of humanity with this portrait of one booze and smoke-filled day, as lost souls gather for wildly inappropriate bonhomie and conversations ranging from profound to incomprehensible. At the centre of all stands – well, slumps – Michael, a “58 year old that looks 70” regular who reads at the bar, shaves in the sink and is there from opening to last call. As the evening progresses and the full spectrum of alcoholic emotion displays itself, the film masterfully careens from riotously funny to tender to ominous, as only a dive bar can. All the while, one question remains unspoken: what happens to people with nowhere else to go when they lose the place they feel at home? — Doug Dillaman

About the Filmmakers

Turner Ross and Bill Ross IV form the Ross Brothers filmmaking duo. Together they’ve directed documentaries on their hometown of Sidney, Ohio (45365, 2009), New Orleans (Tchoupitoulas, 2012), the US–Mexico border (Western, 2015) and David Byrne and his collaborators for the concert Contemporary Color (2016).
A tough-as-nails boxing drama in the vein of Raging Bull, German filmmaker Barbara Ott’s Kids Run is a captivating portrait of precarity that pulls no punches.

A heady blend of social realism and hardscrabble boxing drama, Kids Run is a powerful slice-of-life fight flick not for the faint-of-heart. Newcomer Jannis Niewöhner gives a fascinating, difficult performance as Andi, a desperate young father-of-three who enters an amateur boxing competition in the hope of paying off his escalating debts. Trapped in a wintry working-class wasteland, Andi and his ilk know only struggle and hardship, not so much living on the brink of disaster as skating constantly along the edge of it. The prize – 5,000 euros – offers less of a path out than a way to simply stay afloat.

Making her feature debut, German filmmaker Barbara Ott’s work here is sensitive but unflinching, never sugar-coating Andi’s bleak circumstances nor making allowances for his violent, hair-trigger personality. Ott commendably shirks the familiar rhythms of the boxing-movie genre – don’t expect a Rocky-esque climactic showdown here. As with British social-realists like Ken Loach, Andrea Arnold and Mike Leigh, Ott’s vision of a hand-to-mouth existence is at times a tough watch, but coloured with vivid, lived-in performances that add a touch of grace to even the toughest situations. — Tom Augustine

About the Filmmaker

Born in 1983 on the German-Czech border, Barbara Ott took a degree in fiction directing at the Film Academy Baden-Württemberg. Her graduation film Sunny (2013) screened successfully at national and international festivals and received numerous awards. Kids Run is her directorial feature debut.
A young paedophile’s return to society is calmly explored in Belgian director Patrice Toye’s powerful, thought-provoking new film. Based on Inge Schilperoord’s controversial novel Muidhond.

This fearlessly empathetic drama about a young man fighting his dark nature asks us to bravely walk in the shoes of a character condemned to the extreme margins of society. Jonathan (23), released from prison and into the care of his mother, resumes a normal, diligent life while grappling with compulsions he desperately wants to escape. When a lonely 10-year-old girl moves in next door and innocently pines for his friendship, his genuine resolve is tested in no uncertain terms.

At once a compelling study of the capacity for rehabilitation and a clear-eyed, visually literate portrait of a tortured inner life, director Patrice Toye’s delicate film holds a steady focus on the human dimension behind paedophilia’s terrifying profile. Its bold questions, more existential than plainly moral, surface through a performance of rare sensitivity and intensity by Tijmen Govaerts, and a remarkable turn by Julia Brown, the little girl whose presence gives rise to both tenderness and very real tension. Tench will challenge every viewer’s notion of empathy – and in tandem with the protagonist’s painful struggle to suppress the unthinkable, the impulse to rush to judgement before understanding.

About the Filmmaker
Patrice Toye is a Belgian director and film teacher based in Brussels. Her second feature film, Nowhere Man (2008), won the NHK International Filmmakers Prize at Sundance and benefited from Wim Wenders’ personal support. Tench is her fourth feature. Selected filmography: Little Black Spiders (2012), Rosie (1998).
In this genuinely powerful and illuminating documentary, we step inside an outpatient mental health clinic run by a sympathetic elderly doctor to pull back “the invisible curtain” obscuring the world of Japan’s mentally ill.

Committed to humane, eye-level methods of documentary filmmaking, Soda Kazuhiro is a humble radical in this often sensationalist genre. We’re proud to present both his latest work, Zero, and the award-winning film that first introduced the world to Dr Yamamoto. Soda’s empathetic camera reveals the difficulties and hopes of the modest clinic Yamamoto founded alongside the lives of his patients, whose raw experiences are alleviated by simple acts of listening and kindness.

“In Japan, people with mental illnesses have long been stigmatized, marginalized and isolated from broader society. In 2009... Soda Kazuhiro released Mental, a film about Yamamoto Masatomo, an elderly psychiatrist in Okayama Prefecture who respected his patients as individuals and built close relationships with them. In the process, he challenged standard psychiatric methods that leaned heavily on medication and institutionalization. As Soda’s fly-on-the-wall camera makes clear, this was no way to get rich. Yamamoto’s hours were long and his clinic was small and rundown. Meanwhile, his wife, Yoshiko, kept domestic and professional wheels turning smoothly. Theirs was a family enterprise, with the ‘family’ including Yamamoto’s patients.” — Mark Schilling, Japan Times

About the Filmmaker
This essential follow-up to Soda Kazuhiro’s taboo-breaking documentary on mental illness in Japanese society revisits the pillar of that film, Dr Yamamoto Masatomo, as he prepares to bid his patients farewell and enter into retirement.

A decade after Mental (also presented at NZIFF20), filmmaker Soda Kazuhiro returns to Chorale Okayama, the mental health clinic run by Dr Yamamoto Masatomo. A deeply compassionate portrait of a doctor who spent decades dedicating his life to the mental health community, Soda captures the many intimate moments between Dr Yamamoto and his patients, including their frank conversations as they try to come to terms with losing a doctor they deeply trust. In a society that shows no respect for their conditions, the patients must navigate the difficult path to mental wellness, and for some, mere survival in everyday life, without the support they have relied on for so long.

As Dr Yamamoto wraps up his professional life, we get an intimate look at his relationship with his wife Yoshiko, whose mind and body are slowly withered by dementia. Soda, as filmmaker and cameraperson, records the casual moments as the couple goes about their daily routine, as Yamamoto is now tasked with caring for his wife after decades of Yoshiko’s unwavering support. At once deeply moving and keenly observed, Zero strikes a deep emotional chord with its subtle and non-sentimental approach. — Vicci Ho

State Funeral

Compiling rare found-footage into an unnerving visual essay on Stalin’s cult of personality, this disquieting film observes the notorious Soviet leader’s 1953 funeral procession – and with it, the end spectacle of a tyrannical regime.

Transporting us into a thronging mass of humanity amidst the state-mandated mourning and burial ceremony for Joseph Stalin, renowned Ukrainian filmmaker Sergei Loznitsa’s latest experimental documentary dives deep into long-forgotten government archives to patiently reveal a surreal picture of, as the director terms it, “terror-induced delusion”.

Visually captivating, State Funeral utilises both colour and monochrome footage – remarkably crisp and clean at almost 70 years old – to produce an immersive experience, at once expansive and claustrophobic. Crowds amass in capacious town squares, with Stalin’s likeness looming large over all in the form of oversized statues and banners and the unending monologue of the public address system. Conversely, inside the Moscow House of Unions, the leader’s pale white corpse is dwarfed by its bed of floral wreaths; the cameras look away to individual displays of grief (or lack thereof) as mourners pass the bier. It is difficult not to wonder how much of the grief is authentic or staged. Without commentary, Loznitsa’s assemblage exposes the uneasy mix of reality, falsity and distortion presented in official documentation. — Jacob Powell

About the Filmmaker
If I Were the Winter Itself

Indulging in the thrill and heartbreak of the artistic process, this unabashedly avant-garde take on the iconic works of Godard, Mendieta and Farocki explores cinema as both a political and playful act.

Join us deep in the Argentine woods for a mesmerising cinematic tour de force.

In Jazmín López’s dazzling and disorienting film, four friends gather at a vast, run-down mansion to film re-enactments of three key activist artworks of the late 60s/early 70s: Jean-Luc Godard’s Marxist playdate La Chinoise (1967), Ana Mendieta’s gender-bending performance piece Untitled (Facial Hair Transplants) (1972), and Harun Farocki’s deadpan napalm exposé Inextinguishable Fire (1969). Bertolt Brecht and Kate Bush also get roped into the fun and games. (Don’t worry, no prior knowledge of any of these works is necessary!) The decay of the estate looks sensational in extreme widescreen and slinky long takes as the camera dances through the maze of the house.

But lead actress Carmen is haunted by a recently ended relationship, and her distraction slowly infects the project and her fellow filmmakers. Time starts to slip, and the characters’ own lives seem to become re-enactments too. What might look dry and esoteric on paper soon turns into something richer, stranger and much more playful: a one-of-a-kind cocktail of self-reflexive movie-movie, architecture porn, Slow Cinema eye candy and ghost story. — Andrew Langridge

Jazmín López is a Buenos Aires-based visual artist and filmmaker. As a director and screenwriter, she debuted with the feature Leones (2012). Her visual artworks have been exhibited at MoMA, Lincoln Center, Centre George Pompidou and KW Institute Berlin, among others.
Kala azar

Working to care for dead animals, a young couple collect deceased pets from people’s homes, while also scavenging for neglected roadkill, in Greek video artist Janis Rafa’s uncanny first feature film.

A defiantly singular addition to the Greek New Wave canon, even by star alumnus Yorgos Lanthimos’ standards, Kala azar fuses the seemingly incongruous worlds of humans and animals to striking effect. Centred on Penelope and Dimitris, nomadic lovers who work for a crematorium service, the film follows their daily routine of house calls to bereaved pet owners, and more surreptitiously, their eye for the corpses of stray animals, an allusion to the titular disease that has killed many canines across the Mediterranean.

The grim pragmatism of their job masks a sincere commitment to respectfully sending-off dead animals. Although director Janis Rafa never shies away from the miasma of the life and death cycle, there’s equal attention given to the wellbeing of animals, and to well-meaning characters – like Penelope’s parents, seen living in filthy domestic bliss with a pack of dogs – who seek genuine cohabitation between species. This raw and improbably beautiful film, a top prizewinner at the Rotterdam International Film Festival, is also uniquely tactile in its visual language, tracing the bodies of humans and animals within a stark environment as if they were endlessly connected landscapes.

About the Filmmaker

Janis Rafa is a Greek artist whose moving image work walks a fine line between subjective interpretation and the authentic representation of landscapes and events. In 2013, she created the Three Farewells trilogy. Kala azar is her debut feature.
Last and First Men

Prodigiously talented composer Jóhann Jóhannsson makes his posthumous directorial debut with an austere, hauntingly gorgeous sci-fi symphony voiced by Tilda Swinton and laced with sadness, wonder and hope.

When Jóhann Jóhannsson died too young in 2018, he left behind a treasure trove of haunting and evocative music, from groundbreaking albums besotted with obsolescence to dense, grimy and unforgettable scores for films like Sicario, Arrival and Mandy. But only a few realised he’d left a film as well. Last and First Men had premiered with live orchestral accompaniment just months before his death, at the Manchester International Festival.

Adapted from the 1930s novel by Olaf Stapledon and completed posthumously – Jóhannsson was re-orchestrating the film to the last – Last and First Men is as uncompromising and solemn as you’d expect. Filming largely at gargantuan abandoned Balkan monuments in grainy black and white, Jóhannsson eschews niceties such as “conventional drama” or “on-screen actors” in favour of mesmerising slow camera movements, Tilda Swinton’s hypnotic and quietly despairing narration from ‘2000 million years in the future’, and a signature score that combines ethereal moments with impossibly dense soundscapes. Jóhannsson’s requiem for humanity has echoes with La Jetée, Tales From the Loop and the films of Béla Tarr, but ultimately this last and first film is a singular monument. — Doug Dillaman

About the Filmmaker
Jóhann Jóhannsson was an Icelandic composer. He released his first solo album, Englaböð, in 2002. Best known for his original film scores which blended elements of electronic and classical music, he was nominated for two Oscars for The Theory of Everything (2014) and Sicario (2015).

Forward: Tomorrow Belongs to Us

These bright young activists are the voices of their generation, fighting against extreme poverty, social inequalities and climate change. They are the children who will change the world.

“Meet seven incredible young activists from around the world with unwavering courage to transform our future. While vying for an international prize for his innovative recycling program, José guides us from his native Peru to introduce pioneering kids from France, Bangladesh, Africa, the US, and beyond, demonstrating that you don’t need all the answers to fix a problem – just a brave first step.” — New York International Children’s Film Festival

“Suppose you were invited to a party along with José Adolfo the Peruvian environmental-minded banker, Arthur the French community organizer for the homeless, Aïssatou the Guinean gender equality advocate, Heena the Indian reporter and teacher, and Peter, Kevin and Jocelyn, three Bolivian child rights campaigners. All of them enjoy international recognition. All of them have created amazing social change in the lives of others and in their communities. Some have won prestigious awards. Surely you would look forward to picking their brains, maybe fish for sympathy about the lamentable state of world affairs, or simply listen to their educated discourse. But what if you arrived and realized that these highly successful movers and shakers were all only between 10 and 15 years old?” — Natja Igney, Riviera Buzz

Fritzi: A Revolutionary Tale

A riveting animated tale of the fall of the Berlin Wall – and people brave enough to change the world – told through the eyes of a courageous 12-year-old girl.

East Germany, 1989. Summertime. While her best friend Sophie visits Hungary, 12-year-old Fritzi dog-sits her little pup, Sputnik. When Fritzi discovers public protests stirring around her, she realises that Sophie may have left for more than a summer break, so she and Sputnik set out to find her. Historically accurate and authentic, and loaded with rich period detail and atmosphere, Fritzi: A Revolutionary Tale shares a powerful all-ages story of peaceful revolution and social uprising. — Nic Marshall

“[Fritzi] does a great job of showing what happened in 1989 in the former communist countries. And it also does a great job of giving kids a lesson to be remembered: how a non-violent protest can cause substantial, long-lasting social and political change — and how the voice of the many can disrupt the power of the few... The parallel with the migrants and refugees of the present day is difficult to miss, no matter the age of the viewer. Fritzi... [reminds] us that everyone, at a certain point in history, was a fugitive, a person searching for a better place to live and raise a family. And this turns Fritzi not only into a history lesson, but also into a lesson in compassion.” — Stefan Dobroiu, Cineuropa

My Extraordinary Summer with Tess

A charming and sensitive all-ages drama that explores life’s lightness and gravity with uplifting emotional depth. Winner of a special mention from the Berlinale Generation KPlus’ adult jury, and the NYICFF Grand Prize Feature Film Award.

10-year-old Sam is enduring a summer family holiday on a Dutch island, but things are far from idyllic – his brother has a broken leg, his mum has terrible migraines, and his dad is constantly trying to encourage togetherness. Sam, who has an imaginative morbid streak and a desire to unpack life’s big questions, embarks on “aloneness training” to prepare for the fact that as the youngest he’ll likely outlive his family. But his training quickly changes tack when he meets 11-year-old Tess, an enigmatic and electric force, with a secret and quest all of her own. — Nic Marshall

"My Extraordinary Summer with Tess is particularly affecting when it’s in quiet rather than breezy mode, and its central duo rise to the task of conveying complicated emotions in tender, telling glances. It helps that Sal Kroonenberg’s scenic cinematography not only makes a visual impact, but reinforces the feature’s thematic journey. In a movie about young hearts and minds trying to find their place in the world – one by accepting life’s losses as well as its connections, the other by exploring her origins – continually placing its searching characters amongst sandy dunes, sprawling hillsides and ocean expanses is a smart and fitting touch.” — Sarah Ward, Sreenedaily

About the Filmmaker

Steven Wouterlood is a Dutch filmmaker. He directed the children’s television film Alles mag (Anything Goes) in 2013, which won an International Emmy Kids Award and the Kids Award at the Toronto International Film Festival, among other prizes. My Extraordinary Summer with Tess is his debut feature film.
Another distinguished and mesmerising animation from celebrated filmmaker Jean-François Laguionie (The Painting, NZIFF12), with co-direction by Xavier Picard, The Prince's Voyage is a unique and astute tale of friendship, tolerance and revelation.

After an aging monkey prince washes up injured in an unfamiliar land, he is rescued by Tom, the sharp and inquisitive chimp-kid of two scientists, who have their own interest in the curious newcomer. As the intrepid boy and the wise royal embark on a series of brilliant escapades, their capacity for mutual respect and understanding begins to break down the borders between their worlds.

With cross-generational connection and acceptance of difference at its thoughtful heart, this beautifully hand-drawn philosophical fable will also delight film buffs with its nods to cinema history, from The Planet of the Apes, to Tarzan, to King Kong and Alexander Nevsky. — Nic Marshall

“Jean-François Laguionie is a world-renowned master of French animation whose major works are all characterised by an air or style that is difficult to pinpoint – at some moments they strongly resemble fairy tales, at others they’re more like science-fiction epics; invariably, though, at the core of it all, there’s a mythology whose realisation has earned him many fans. He gives us something extremely rare: adult animations that children and youngsters can thoroughly enjoy as well.” — International Film Festival Rotterdam

Animation NOW! 2020

A celebratory showcase of some of the year’s best and brightest animated shorts. If you’re looking to sample the animation ecosystem in all its multi-coloured, variously-shaped glory, there’s no better place to begin.

Welcome to Animation NOW!

Diversity was the guiding light in bringing together this single programme of animation from the 3,000+ submissions we received this year. Techniques range from paint-on-glass and hand-drawn, to the exquisite precision of 3D digital animation and the beautiful imperfections inherent in all stop motion work. Storylines, too, range eclectically from classic narrative right across the creative tundra to the kind of uncannily malleable chronicles animation often does so well.

Violent Equation brings a polished digital elegance to the surrealist labyrinth it navigates while the simple grace of Moth relies as much on its striking, painterly style as it does its humble inspiration.

The inspiration behind Girl in the Hallway is all too clear and as one of the most affecting films submitted this year it had to close the programme, simply because it was hard to imagine what could follow it. But opening Animation NOW! 2020 is the latest film by one of New Zealand’s most accomplished animators. James Cunningham’s Prickly Jam showcases both the extraordinary technical virtuosity and the wickedly off-beat humour for which he is internationally renowned. — Malcolm Turner

These four works of art cinema explore the feeling of loss, looking back to the past with anxiety for the future. New Zealand artists Gavin Hipkins and Virginia King explore foreign but familiar spaces, creating new memories for a forgotten time. Dane Mitchell’s Venice Biennale 2019 installation explores vanished phenomena as the city slowly sinks, while Italian collective Flatform brings the effects of global warming in the Pacific to vivid life.

A young man’s letter to his mother, sent home to New Zealand from England during the First World War. London’s Royal Parks provide a painterly setting for this meditation on Empire, travel and longing, that features Gavin Hipkins’ grandfather’s photography and writings from his enlisted travels.

Lettre de Venezia (7 minutes)
Virginia King captures footage of her textual sculpture Floating Alphabet drifting through the Grand Canal in Venice during the Biennale 2019, combining it with imagery of both the faded opulence of the sinking city’s 15th-century buildings and the gorgeous illuminated manuscripts that her work echoes.

A List of Lost Poems (28 minutes)
New Zealand artist Dane Mitchell’s exhibition for the Venice Biennale 2019 Post hoc employed modern technologies to invoke the memory of the lost. Adam Luxton’s short doco explores Mitchell’s process from his Auckland studio, to a cell tower factory in Guangzhou and the final installation in Venice.

That Which Is to Come Is Just a Promise (22 minutes)
A single shot takes us through Funafuti in Tuvalu as overheated sea water rises up through the drought-parched earth and floods the atoll. A portrait of a territory in flux, land that is becoming ocean and the concrete effects of global warming writ large.

This sweet and sour coming-of-age comedy smashed into Sundance with anarchy on its mind and a kickass soundtrack on its turntable. The bad boy-meets-good girl setup has been fodder for cinema for aeons, so it was about time someone took a chainsaw to the status quo.

Adam Rehmeier’s rebel yell of a movie is as if Valley Girl was accidentally shunted into a teleportation machine alongside Sid & Nancy and the whole soupy stew beamed into the 90s. Funny and fucked up like some speed-snorting comic on an all-time bender, there’s a hypnotic lure in watching two worlds slowly inch towards an inevitable beautiful collision.

Our two loveable misfits here are Simon (Kyle Gallner), an obnoxious anarchist musician whose hobbies include pyromania and drug-dealing, and Patty (Emily Skeggs), an awkward pet store employee and the target of bullies. Hiding out from the cops, Simon runs into Patty, a simple geek whose one emotional lifeline is punk rock. Eventually these two outcasts will learn more about each other, and in the banality of suburbia, may just end up saving each other from the hand life has dealt them.

Both leads deliver star-making performances in showy roles. They’re ably supported by a fun mix of fan faves, from horny MILF Lea Thompson to stoned squares Pat Healy and Mary Lynn Rajskub. Accompanied by an electro-thrash score and cool widescreen lensing, this warped comedy will delight those who like their laughs with a healthy side of teen alienation and suburban neurosis. — Ant Timpson

Jesus Shows You the Way to the Highway

Miguel Llansó’s sophomore feature is a glorious cherry bomb of outsider psychotronica. Grandiose and enjoyably nutty, no recent film has managed to excite about the future of independent cinema as much as this joyous everything-and-the-kitchen-sink approach to the ultimate conspiracy flick.

A potpourri of kitsch art direction and surreal absurdism in a steaming crockpot of 70s martial art capers, outré science-fiction, European James Bond rip-offs, Filipino exploitation, electronic muzak, free jazz and cold war paranoia, Jesus is the hallucinatory tale of CIA Agents DT Gagano (on his last job) and Palmer Eldritch. Both are guinea pigs in a top-secret experiment where they’ll go into a coma to fight a Soviet computer virus named Stalin in a virtual reality world. If you’re wondering what that looks like, imagine jiggly live-action animated agents wearing Robert Redford and Richard Pryor cardboard masks fighting evil everywhere.

When the bad guys in the virtual world wound Gagano, he becomes stuck in his comatose state back in the lab. His wife Malin, a Teutonic specimen twice his size, is crestfallen as she’d been planning on opening a kickboxing studio pizza parlour with him following his forthcoming retirement. This bonkers Euro-mad production is one for the ages so grab some [insert choice of mind-altering substance here], a bunch of likeminded friends and get ready to witness this utter marvel of low-budget ingenuity. It may just make you love indie cinema all over again. — Ant Timpson

About the Filmmaker
Inspired by experimental-punk-weird music and films, Miguel Llansó studied philosophy and cinema before directing Crumbs (2015), a post-apocalyptic Afro-futuristic adventure in Ethiopia. Jesus Shows You the Way to the Highway is his second feature film.
Who would have thought one of the most oddly romantic films of recent years would be based on the true encounter of a woman and her love for nuts and bolts?

In Jumbo, Zoé Wittock’s sublime Spielbergian love story, Jeanne finds herself drawn to the mechanical object of her desire, an enormous Tilt-A-Whirl ride. Played by Noémie Merlant (Portrait of a Lady on Fire), she’s an attractive recluse of sorts, preferring to hibernate in an enclosed world with her overbearing single mum. Early on we get an inkling of her hidden needs when we catch her masturbating to various objects, in a bedroom cluttered with lights and miniature fairground rides. At night she works as a cleaner at the local amusement park. When a new attraction begins to weave a pneumatic spell, she becomes convinced it is alive and communicating with her.

Jeanne’s pushy mum thinks her boss Marc is a catch and in any other film of this ilk he would be the man with all the right moves. This isn’t that film. Not one for hiding her true desires, much of the film’s sincerity and awkward humour comes from Jeanne attempting to bridge the gap of understanding with those dearest to her. Gorgeously lensed throughout with smart production design to match, Jumbo features a rich soundscape and score that breathes life into both the living and inanimate, creating one of the more remarkable debut films in recent times. — Ant Timpson

About the Filmmaker

Zoé Wittock is a Belgian filmmaker currently based in Paris. Her debut feature film Jumbo, which explores objectum-sexuality, was developed from the true story of Erika Labrie, an Olympic gold medal winner in archery, who got married to the Eiffel Tower in 2004.
Leap of Faith: William Friedkin on The Exorcist

Unpacking one of the landmark films of the 1970s, William Friedkin talks big on the secrets and success of The Exorcist in this stellar cinematic essay, framed around an epic six-day interview with the maverick director.

William Friedkin was a smoking hot wunderkind fresh off the success of The French Connection when he decided to adapt William Peter Blatty's bestselling novel The Exorcist. No one could have predicted the shattering effect the film would have on audiences around the world.

Alexandre O. Philippe, an astute chronicler of genre film, goes one-on-one with cinema's greatest raconteur in a fireside chat dissecting the film that changed the cinema landscape forever. A fascinating lapsed Catholic and a naturally gifted filmmaker, Friedkin is never short for words about his films and cinema in general, whether he's referring to the emotional austerity of Carl Dreyer's Ordet or the subliminal nod to Magritte's painting The Empire of Light. Opinionated, arrogant, fearless, bullying and brilliant, the man affectionately known as 'Wild Bill' reveals behind-the-scenes anecdotes about a moment in cinema that will never be repeated. Throughout this zigzagging conversation, his manner ranges from thoughtful and playful to contradictory and prickly.

Endlessly absorbing for fans, this self-interrogation about the creation of "the scariest film of all time" will even entertain those who've never had the courage to watch it. — Ant Timpson

About the Filmmaker
Alexandre O. Philippe is a Swiss director with an interest in examining influential works by master filmmakers and dissecting seminal screen moments. He has deconstructed the shower scene in Psycho (78/52, 2017) and the mythologies of the Alien franchise (Memory: The Origins of Alien, 2019), among other film-focused documentaries.
Those with a voracious appetite for fresh variations on the zombie genre will lap up this juicy Belgian horror comedy about a virus outbreak in a run-down hospital offering cheap cosmetic surgery to desperate clients.

The zombie film is forever springing back to life like some cheap jump scare. In the funny and grotesque Yummy, the playbook gets a new chapter with director Lars Damoiseaux’s lively Flemish take on the genre, drawing some fresh blood onto an already heavily coated crimson canvas.

Early signs of a splatter shit-storm on the horizon are apparent when a young couple travel to a dubious Eastern European hospital for some cosmetic surgery. Alison (Maaike Neuvillet), the girlfriend, wants a breast reduction while her surgery-addicted mother has also tagged along for yet another facelift. Eventually her boyfriend Michael (Bart Hollanders) wanders off to an abandoned area of the hospital, only to find a woman gagged and strapped to an operating table. She’s actually patient zero in a rejuvenation experiment and in releasing her, he unwittingly releases a virus that proceeds to infect and tear through all and sundry.

The film, much like its characters, resembles old flesh given a slick nip/tuck job via the talented hands of an up-and-coming European director. The end result is brimming with enough humour, outlandish gore and nudity to satiate the old-school horror cognoscenti and newcomers alike. — Ant Timpson

About the Filmmaker
Lars Damoiseaux is a writer and director born in The Netherlands. His short film Patient Zero (2016) was the basis for his feature debut, Yummy.
